Their proper church-name is Brethren. Driven from Germany by persecution early in the eighteenth century, they took refuge in Pennsylvania, and thence extended their societies into neighboring States, and are especially found in Ohio. They condemn all war and litigation, acknowledge the authority of the Bible, administer baptism by triple immersion, and only to adults, practise washing of the feet before the Lord's supper, use the kiss of charity, laying on of hands, and anointing with oil, and observe a severe simplicity in dress and speech. They have bishops, elders, and teachers, and are commonly supposed to accept the doctrine of universal redemption. Also called Dipper.

Dunker² (dung'kér), n. Same as duncur.

Dunkirk lace. See lace.

dunlin (dun'lin), n. [A corruption of E. dial. dunling, the proper form, < *dun*¹ + *dim. ling*¹. Cf. dunbird, duncock.] The red-backed sandpiper, Tringa (Pelidna) alpina, widely dispersed and very abundant in the northern hemisphere, especially along sea-coasts, during the extensive migrations it performs between its arctic breeding-grounds and its temperate or tropical winter resorts. The dunlin is 8 inches long, the bill an inch or more, slightly decurved; in full dress the belly is jet-black, the upper parts varied with brown, gray, and reddish. The American dunlin is a different variety, somewhat larger, with a longer and more decurved bill, the Pelidna pacifica of Coues. The dunlin is also called stint, purre, ox-bird, bull's-eye, sea-snipe, pickereel, etc.

American Dunlin (Pelidna pacifica), in summer plumage.

dunling (dun'ling), n. A dialectal (and originally more correct) form of dunlin.

Von Ranke, Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 19.

Duodecimal arithmetic or scale. See duodenary arithmetic or scale, under duodenary.

II. n. 1. One of a system of numerals the base of which is twelve.—2. pl. An arithmetical rule for ascertaining the number of square feet, twelfths of feet, and square inches in a rectangular area or surface whose sides are given in feet and inches and twelfths of inches. The feet of the multiplicand are first multiplied into the feet, inches, and twelfths of the multiplicand, giving square feet, twelfths, and inches. The inches of the multiplicand are then multiplied into the feet and inches of the multiplicand, giving twelfths of feet and square inches, and finally the twelfths of inches of the multiplicand are multiplied into the feet of the multiplicand, giving square inches. These three partial products are then added together to get the product sought. It is used by artificers. Also called duodecimal or cross multiplication.

duodecimally (dū-ō-des'i-mal-i), adv. In a duodecimal manner; by twelves.

duodecimfid (dū-ō-dē-sim'fid), a. [C. L. duodecim, twelve, + -fidus, < findere, cleave, split (= E. bite): see fission, etc.] Divided into twelve parts.

duodecimo (dū-ō-des'i-mō), n. and a. [Orig. in L. (NL.) phrase in duodecimo: in, prep., = E. in; duodecimo, abl. of duodecim, twelfth, < duodecim, twelve.] I. n. 1. A size of page usually measuring, in the United States, about 5½ inches in width and 7¾ inches in length, when the leaf is uncut, and corresponding to crown octavo of British publishers.—2. A book composed of sheets which, when folded, form twelve leaves of this size.—3. In music, the interval of a twelfth. E. D.

II. a. Consisting of sheets folded into twelve leaves; having leaves or pages measuring about 5½ by 7¾ inches. Often written 12mo or 12°.

duodecimole (dū-ō-des'i-mōl), n. [C. L. duodecim, twelve: see duodecimo.] In music, a group of twelve notes to be performed in the time of eight; a duodecuplet.

Duodecimpennatæ (dū-ō-dē-sim-pe-nā'tē), n. pl. [NL., < L. duodecim, twelve, + pennatus, winged, feathered.] In ornith., in Sundevall's system, a cohort of Gallinae, composed of the American curassows and guans, Cracidae: so called from the 12 rectrices or tail-feathers. Also called Sylvicole.

duodecuple (dū-ō-dēk'ū-pl), a. [= F. duodecuple = Sp. duodecuplo = Pg. It. duodecuplo, < L. duo, = E. two, + decuplus, tenfold: see decuple and duodecimal.] Consisting of twelves.

duodena, n. Plural of duodenum.

duodenal¹ (dū-ō-dē'nal), a. [= F. duodenal = Sp. Pg. duodenal = It. duodenale; as duodenum + -al.] Connected with or relating to the duodenum: as, "duodenal dyspepsia." Copland.—Duodenal fold, a special loop or duplication of the duodenum, in which the pancreas is lodged in many animals, especially in birds, where it forms the most constant and characteristic folding of the intestine.—Duodenal glands. See gland.

duodenal² (dū-ō-dē'nal), a. and n. [C. duodene + -al.] I. a. Pertaining to a duodene.

II. n. In musical theory, the symbol of the root of a duode.

duodenary (dū-ō-den'ā-rī), a. [= F. duodénaire = Sp. Pg. It. duodenario, < L. duodenarius, containing twelve, < duodeni, twelve each, < duodecim, twelve.] Relating to the number twelve; twelvefold; increasing by twelves.—Duodenary or duodecimal arithmetic or scale, that system in which the local value of the figures increases in a twelvefold proportion from right to left, instead of in the tenfold proportion of the common decimal arithmetic.

duodene (dū-ō-dēn), n. [< L. duodeni, twelve each: see duodenary. Cf. duodenum.] In musical theory, a group of twelve tones, having precise acoustical relations with one another, arranged so as to explain and correct problems in harmony and modulation. Any tone whatever may be chosen as the root, and its symbol is called a duodenal. The root, the major third above, and the major third below it constitute the initial trine. The duodene consists of four such trines, one being the initial trine, one a perfect fifth below it, one a perfect fifth above it, and one two perfect fifths above it. The term and the process of analysis to which it belongs were first used by A. J. Ellis in England in 1874. The study of the process is incident to the attempt to secure just intonation (pure temperament) on keyed instruments of fixed pitch.

duodenitis (dū-ō-dē-nī'tis), n. [< NL. < duodenum + -itis.] Inflammation of the duodenum.

duodenostomy (dū-ō-dē-nōs'tō-mī), n. [< NL. duodenum, q. v., + Gr. stōmia, mouth, opening.] The surgical formation of an external opening from the duodenum through the abdominal wall.

duodenum (dū-ō-dē-num), n.; pl. duodena (-nā). [< NL. (so called because in man it is about twelve finger-breadths long), < L. duodeni, twelve each: see duodenary.] 1. In anat., the first portion of the small intestine, in immediate connection with the stomach, receiving the hepatic and pancreatic secretions, and usually curved or folded about the pancreas. It extends from the pylorus to the beginning of the jejunum. In man it is from 10 to 12 inches in length. See cuts under alimentary and intestine.

2. In entom., a short smooth portion of the intestine, between the ventriculus and the ileum, found in a few coleopterous insects. Some entomologists, however, apply this name to the ventriculus.

duodrama (dū-ō-drā'mā), n. [= F. duodrame = It. duodramma, < L. duo, two (= Gr. duo = E. two), + Gr. drāma, a drama: see drama.] A dramatic or melodramatic piece for two performers only.

The bishop is said to have decorated the duomo with 500 large and 200 small columns brought from Paros for the purpose.

C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, Int., p. xxxv., note.

dup (dʌp), v. t. [Contr. of dial. do up, open, < ME. do up, don up, open: see *do*¹, and cf. *don*¹, doff, *dout*¹.] To open.

What Devell! iche weene, the porters are drunke; wil they not dup the gate to-day?

R. Edwards, Damon and Pythias.

Then up he rose and donn'd his clothes, And dupp'd the chamber door.

Shak., Hamlet, iv. 5.

dupability (dū-pa-bil'i-ti), n. [Also written, less reg., dupeability; < dupable: see -bility.] The quality of being dupable; gullibility.

But this poor Napoleon mistook; he believed too much in the dupability of men. Carlyle.

dupable (dū-pa-bl), a. [Also written, less reg., dupeable; < dup + -able.] Capable of being duped; gullible.

Man is a dupable animal. Southey, The Doctor, lxxxvii.

duparted (dū-pār-ted), a. [< L. duo, = E. two, + parted.] In her., same as biparted.

dupe (dʌp), n. [< F. dupe, a dupe, < OF. dupe, duppe, F. dial. dube, duppe, a hoopoe, a bird regarded as stupid: see hoopoe and Upupa. For similar examples of the application of the names of (supposed) stupid birds to stupid persons, cf. booby, goose, gull, and (in Pg.) dodo. Cf. Bret. houperik, a hoopoe, a dupe.] A person who is deceived; one who is led astray by false representations or conceptions; a victim of credulity: as, the dupe of a designing rogue; he is a dupe to his imagination.

First slave to words, then vassal to a name, Then dupe to party; child and man the same.

Pope, Dunciad, iv. 502.

He that hates truth shall be the dupe of lies.

Couper, Progress of Error.

When the spirit is not master of the world, then it is its dupe. Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 229.

dupe (dʌp), v. t.; pret. and pp. duped, ppr. duping. [< F. duper, dupe, gull, take in; from the noun.] To deceive; trick; mislead by imposing on one's credulity: as, to dupe a person by flattery.

Ne'er have I duped him with base counterfeits.

Coleridge.

Instead of making civilization the friend of the poor, it [the theory of social equality] has duped the poor into making themselves the enemies of civilization.

W. H. Mallock, Social Equality, p. 211.

dupeability, dupeable. See dupability, dupable.

dupér (dū'pér), n. [< Dupe + *-er*¹; after OF. (and F.) dupeur, a deceiver.] One who dupes or deceives; a cheat; a swindler.

The race-ground had its customary complement of knaves and fools—the dupers and the duped.

Bulwer, Pelham, I. xii.

dupery (dū'pér-i), n. [< F. duperie, < dupe, a dupe: see dupe, n.] The art of deceiving or imposing upon the credulity of others; the ways or methods of a dupe.

Travelling from town to town in the full practice of dupery and wheedling. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., I. 304.

It might be hard to see an end to the inquiry were we once to set diligently to work to examine and set forth how much innocent dupery we habitually practise upon ourselves in the region of metaphysics.

Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 23.

dupion, doupion (dū-, dō'pi-on), n. [< F. doupion, < It. doppione, aug. of doppio, double, < L. duplus, double: see double, and also doubloon and dobroa, doublets of dupion.] 1. A double cocoon formed by two silkworms spinning together.—2. The coarse silk furnished by such double cocoons.

duplication (dū-plā'shon), n. [< L. duplus, double, + -ation.] Multiplication by two; doubling.

duple (dū'pl), a. [= Sp. Pg. It. duplo, < L. duplus, double: see double, the old form.] Double. [Rare in general use.]

A competent defence of Illyricum was upon a two-fold reason established, the duple greatness of which business the emperor having taken in hand affected both.

Holland, tr. of Ammianus, p. 101.

Duple ratio, a ratio such as that of 2 to 1, 8 to 4, etc. Subduple ratio is the reverse, or as 1 to 2, 4 to 8, etc.—Duple rhythm, in music, a rhythm characterized by two beats or pulses to the measure; double time.

duple (dū'pl), v. t.; pret. and pp. dupled, ppr. dupling. [< duple, a.] To double. [Rare.]

duplet (dū'plet), n. [< L. duplus, double, + E. dim. -et.] A doublet. [Rare.]

That is to throw three dice till duplets and a chance be thrown, and the highest duplet wins.

Dryden, Mock Astrologer, iii.

duplex (dū'pleks), a. and n. [< L. duplex, double, twofold, < duo, = E. two, + plicare, fold.] 1. a. Double; twofold. Specifically applied in electricity to a system of telegraphy in which two messages are transmitted at the same time over a single wire; it includes both duplex and contraplex. See these words.—Duplex escapement of a watch. See escapement.—Duplex idea, lathe, pelitti. See the nouns.—Duplex quereia (eccles.), a double quarrel (which see, under quarrel).

II. n. A doubling or duplicating.

duplex (dū'pleks), v. [< duplex, a.] 1. trans. In teleg., to arrange (a wire) so that two messages may be transmitted along it at the same time.

Four perfectly independent wires were practically created. . . . Each of these wires was also duplexed.

G. B. Prescott, Elect. Invent., p. 219.

II. intrans. To transmit telegraphic messages by the duplex system.

duplicate (dū'pli-kāt), v.; pret. and pp. duplicated, ppr. duplicating. [< L. duplicatus, pp. of duplicare, make double, < duplex (duplic), double, twofold: see duplex. Cf. double, v.] 1. trans. 1. To double; repeat; produce a second (like the first); make a copy or copies of.

Whereof perhaps one reason is, because there is shewn in this a duplicated power: a contrary stream of power running across and thwart, in its effects in this.

Goodwin, Works, III. i. 558.

2. In physiol., to divide into two by natural growth or spontaneous division: as, some infusorians duplicate themselves.

II. intrans. To become double; repeat or be repeated; specifically, in ecclesiastical use, to celebrate the mass or holy communion twice in the same day. See duplication.

The desires of man, if they pass through an even and indifferent life towards the issues of an ordinary and necessary course, they are little, and within command; but if they pass upon an end or aim of difficulty or ambition, they duplicate, and grow to a disturbance.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 104.

If the Priest has to duplicate, i. e., to celebrate twice in one day, he must not drink the ablutions, which must be poured into a chalice and left for him to consume at the second celebration. For to drink the ablutions would be to break his fast.

F. G. Lee, Directorium Anglicanum, 4th ed. (1879), p. 248.

duplicate (dū'pli-kāt), a. and n. [= It. duplicato = D. duplicaat = G. Dan. duplikat, < L. duplicatus, pp. of duplicare, make double: see duplicate, v.] 1. a. 1. Double; twofold; consisting of or relating to a pair or pairs, or to two corresponding parts: as, duplicate spines in an insect; duplicate examples of an ancient coin; duplicate proportion.—2. Consisting of a double number or quantity; multiplied by two.

The estates of Bruges little doubted to admit so small a number into so populous a company, yea though the number were duplicate.

Hall, Hen. VII., an. 5.

3. Exactly like or corresponding to something made or done before; repeating an original; matched: as, there are many duplicate copies of this picture; a duplicate action or proceeding.—Duplicate proportion or ratio, the proportion or ratio of squares; thus, in geometrical proportion, the first term is said to be to the third in the duplicate ratio of the first to the second, or as its square is to the square of the second. Thus, in 9:15::15:25, the ratio of 9 to 25 is a duplicate of that of 9 to 15, or as the square of 9 is to the square of 15; also, the duplicate ratio of a to b is the ratio of a to b or of *a*² to *b*².

II. n. 1. One of two or more things corresponding in every respect to each other.

Of all these he [Vertue] made various sketches and notes, always presenting a duplicate of his observations to Lord Oxford.

Walpole, Life of Vertue.

Specifically, in law and com.: (a) An instrument or writing corresponding in every particular to a first or original and of equal validity with it; an additional original.

Duplicates of dispatches and of important letters are frequently sent by another conveyance, as a precaution against the risk of a miscarriage. The copy which first reaches its destination is treated as an original. Wharton.

In the case of mutual contracts, such as leases, contracts of marriage, copartnership, and the like, duplicates of the deed are frequently prepared, each of which is signed by all the contracting parties; and, where this is done, the parties are bound if one of the duplicates be regularly executed, although the other should be defective in the necessary solemnities. Bel.

(b) A second copy of a document, furnished by authority when the original has been lost, defaced, or invalidated.

2. One of two or more things each of which corresponds in all essential respects to an original, type, or pattern; another corresponding to a first or original; another of the same kind; a copy: as, a duplicate of a bust.

Many duplicates of the General's wagon stand about the church in every direction.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 72.

duplication (dū-pli-kā'shon), n. [= F. duplicatio = Pr. duplicatio = Sp. duplicación = Pg. duplicação = It. duplicazione, < L. duplicatio (n-), < duplicare, pp. duplicatus, double: see duplicate, v.] 1. The act of duplicating, or of making or repeating something essentially the same as something previously existing or done.

However, if two sheriffs appear in one year (as at this time and frequently hereafter), such duplicatio cometh to pass by one of these accidents.

Fuller, Worthies, Berkshire.

2. In arith., the multiplication of a number by two.—3. A folding; a doubling; also, a fold: as, the duplication of a membrane.—4. In physiol., the act or process of dividing into two by natural growth or spontaneous division.—5. In music, the process or act of adding the upper or lower octaves or replicates to the tones of a melody or harmony. See double, n. and v.—6. In bot., same as chorisis.—7. In admiralty law, a pleading on the part of the defendant in reply to the replication. Benedict. [Rare].—8. Eccles., the celebration of the mass or eucharist twice by the same priest on the same day. From the sixth century to the thirteenth, duplication was in many places not an unusual practice on a number of days. Since the fourteenth century it has been forbidden in the Roman Catholic Church except on Christmas day. In the medieval church in England it was allowed on Easter day also. The Greek Church does not permit duplication.—Duplication formula, in math., a formula for obtaining the sine, etc., of the double of an angle from the functions of the angle itself.—Problem of the duplication, or duplication of the cube, in math. the problem to determine the side of a cube which shall have double the solid contents of a given cube. The problem is equivalent to finding the cube root of 2, which is neither rational nor rationally expressible in terms of square roots of integers; consequently neither an exact numerical solution nor an exact construction with a rule and compass is possible. Also called the Delian problem.

There remain yet some other pages of Mr. Hobbes's dialogue, wherein he speaks of . . . the duplication of the cube, and the quadrature of the circle.

Boyle, Works, I. 234.

The altar of Apollo at Athens was a square block, or cube, and to double it required the duplication of the cube. D. Webster, Speech, Mechanics' Inst., Nov. 12, 1828.

duplicative (dū'pli-kā-tiv), n. [= F. duplicatif; as duplicate + -ive.] Having the quality of duplicating or doubling; especially, in physiol., having the quality of duplicating or dividing into two by natural growth or spontaneous division.

In the lowest forms of Vegetable life, the primordial germ multiplies itself by duplicative subdivision into an apparently unlimited number of cells.

W. B. Carpenter, in Grove's Corr. of Forces.

duplicatopectinate (dū-pli-kā-tō-pek'ti-nāt), a. [duplicate + pectinate.] In entom., having the branches of bipectinate antennæ on each side alternately long and short.

duplicate (dū'pli-kā-tūr), n. [= F. duplicature = It. duplicatura, < L. as if duplicatura*, < duplicare, pp. duplicatus, double: see duplicate, v.] A doubling; a fold or folding; a duplication: as, a duplicate of the peritoneum.

The kidneys and bladder are contained in a distinct duplication of that membrane [the peritoneum], being there by partitioned off from the other contents of the abdomen. Paley, Nat. Theol., xi.

duplicitentate (dū'pli-si-den'tāt), a. [duplicate, < L. duplex (duplic-), double, + dentatus = E. toothed: see dentate.] Of or pertaining to the Duplicidentati; having four upper incisors, two of which are much smaller than and situated behind the other two, of which they thus appear like duplicates, as in the hare, rabbit, or pika. Coues.

Duplicidentati (dū'pli-si-den-tā'ti), n. pl. [NL. (sc. Glires), orig. Duplicidentata (sc. Rodentia, Illiger, 1811); pl. of duplicidentatus: see duplicidentate.] A prime division of the order Rodentia or Glires, containing those rodents, as the hares and pikas, which have four upper front teeth—that is, twice as many as ordinary rodents, or Simplicidentati. The group consists of the families Leporidae and Lagomyidae. E. R. Alston.

duplicitly (dū-plis'i-ti), n. [ME. duplicite, < OF. duplicite, F. duplicité = Sp. duplicidad = Pg. duplicidade = It. duplicità, < LL. duplicita(t-s), doubleness, ML. ambiguity, < L. duplex (duplic-), twofold, double: see duplex.] 1. The state of being double; doubleness. [Rare.]

They neither acknowledge a multitude of unmade deities, nor yet that duplicitly of them which Plutarch contended for (one good and the other evil).

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 231.

These intermediate examples need not in the least confuse our generally distinct ideas of the two families of buildings; the one in which the substance is alike throughout, and the forms and conditions of the ornament assume or prove that it is so; . . . and the other, in which the substance is of two kinds, one internal, the other external, and the system of decoration is founded on this duplicitly, as pre-eminently in St. Mark's. I have used the word duplicitly in no depreciatory sense. Ruskin.

A star in the Northern Crown, . . . (γ Corona), was found to have completed more than one entire circuit since its first discovery; another, γ Serpentarii, had closed up into apparent singleness; while in a third, ζ Orionis, the converse change had taken place, and deceptive singleness had been transformed into obvious duplicitly.

A. M. Clerke, Astron. in 19th Cent., p. 58.

2. Doubleness of heart or speech; the acting or speaking differently in relation to the same thing at different times or to different persons, with intention to deceive; the practice of deception by means of dissimulation or double-dealing.

And shall we even now, whilst we are yet smarting from the consequences of her treachery, become a second time the good easy dupes of her duplicitly?

Anecdotes of Bp. Watson, I. 273.

I think the student of their character should also be slow to upbraid Italians for their duplicitly, without admitting, in palliation of the faults, facts of long ages of alien and domestic oppression, in politics and religion.

Hovells, Venetian Life, xxi.

3. In law, the pleading of two or more distinct matters together as if constituting but one.—Syn. 2. Guile, deception, hypocrisy, artifice, chicanery.

duplo- (dū'plō), [L. duplus, double: see double.] A prefix signifying 'twofold' or 'twice as much': as, duplo-carburet, twofold carburet. duply (dū'pli'), n.; pl. duplies (-pliz'). [duply*, v. (on type of reply, < OF. replier), < OF. as if duplier*, F. only dupliquer = Sp. Pg. duplicar = It. duplicare, < ML. duplicare, put in a rebutter, make a second reply, L. duplicare, double: see duplicate, a.] In Scots law, a second reply: a pleading formerly in use in inferior courts.

Answers, replies, duplies, triplies, quadruples, followed thick upon each other. Scott, Abbot, i.

dupondius (dū-pon'di-us), n.; pl. dupondii (-i). [L., also dupondium, dupondum, < duo, = E. two, + pondus, a weight, < pendere, weigh: see pound.] A Roman bronze coin, of the value of 2 asses (see as), issued by Augustus and some of his successors: popularly called by coin-collectors "second brass," to distinguish it from the sestertius, the "first brass" Roman coin.

dupper (dū'pēr), n. Same as *dubber*².

Durpytten's contraction. See contraction.

dur (dūr), n. [= G. Dan. Sw. dur, < L. durus, hard.] In music, major: as, C dur, or C major.

dura (dū'rā), n. [NL., fem. of L. durus, hard: see dure.] 1. Same as duramen.—2. The dura mater (which see). Wilder and Gage.

durability (dū-rā-bil'i-ti), n. [= Dan. Sw. durabilitet, < F. durabilité (OF. dureblete) = Pr. durabilitat = Pg. durabilidade = It. durabilità, < LL. durabilita(t-s), < L. durabilis, durable: see durable.] The quality of being durable; the power of lasting or continuing in the same state by resistance to causes of decay or dissolution.

A Gothic cathedral raises ideas of grandeur in our minds by its size, its height, . . . its antiquity, and its durability. H. Blair, Rhetoric, iii.

durable (dū'rā-bl), a. [= D. Dan. Sw. durabel, < F. durable = Pr. Sw. durable = Pg. duravel = It. durabile, < L. durabilis, lasting, < durare, last, < durus, hard, lasting: see dure, v.] Having the quality of lasting, or continuing long in being; not perishable or changeable; lasting; enduring: as, durable timber; durable cloth; durable happiness.

The monuments of wit and learning are more durable than the monuments of power, or of the hands. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 101.

They might take vp their Croise, and follow the second Adam vnto a durable happiness. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 28.

For time, though in eternity, applied To motion, measures all things durable By present, past, and future. Milton, P. L., v. 581.

The very susceptibility that makes him quick to feel makes him also incapable of deep and durable feeling. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 364.

durableness (dū'rā-bl-nes), n. The quality of being lasting or enduring; durability: as, the durableness of honest fame.

As for the timber of the walnut-tree, it may be termed an English shittim-wood for the fineness, smoothness, and durableness thereof. Fuller, Worthies, Surrey.

The durableness of metals is the foundation of this extraordinary steadiness of price. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, i. 11.

durably (dū'rā-bli), adv. In a lasting manner; with long continuance.

An error in physical speculations is seldom productive of such consequences, either to one's neighbour or one's self, as are deeply, durably, or extensively injurious. V. Knox, Essays, i.

dural (dū'ral), a. [dura* (mater) + -al.] Of or pertaining to the dura mater.

The dural vessels were well injected externally and internally. Medical News, LII. 430.

dura mater (dū'rā mā'tēr), [NL.: L. dura, fem. of durus, hard; mater, mother: see dure, mother, and cf. dura.] The outermost membranous envelop or external meninx of the brain and spinal cord; a dense, tough, glistening fibrous membrane which lines the interior of the brain-case, but in the spinal column is separated from the periosteum lining the vertebrae by a space filled with loose areolar tissue. In the skull it envelops the brain, but does not send down processes into the fissures. It forms, however, some main folds, as the vertical falcatæ sheet or falk cerebri between the hemispheres of the cerebrum, and the tentorium or horizontal sheet between the cerebrum and the cerebellum. Sundry venous channels between layers of the dura mater are the sinuses of the brain. The term dura mater is contrasted with pia mater, both these meninges being so named from an old fanciful notion that they were the "mothers," or at least the nurses, of the contained parts.

duramen (dū-rā'men), n. [NL., < L. duramen, hardness, also applied to a ligneous vine-branch, < durare, harden, < durus, hard: see dure.] In bot., the central wood or heart-wood in the trunk of an exogenous tree. It is harder and more solid than the newer wood that surrounds it from the formation of secondary layers of cellulose in the wood-cells. It is also usually of a deeper color, owing to the presence of peculiar coloring matters. Called by ship-carpenters the spine. See albumum. Also dura.

The inner layers of wood, being not only the oldest, but the most solidified by matters deposited within their component cells and vessels, are spoken of collectively under the designation duramen or "heart-wood." W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 369.

durance (dū'rāns), n. [Early mod. E. also durance, durance; < OF. durance = Sp. duranza = It. duranza, < ML. as if durantia*, < L. durant(t-s), ppr. of durare, last: see dure, v. In E. durance is prob. in part an abbr. by apheresis of endurance, q. v.] 1. Duration; continuance; endurance. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Loe! I have made a Calender for every year, That steele in strength, and time in durance, shall out-weare. Spenser, Shep. Cal., Epil.

An antique kind of work, composed of little square pieces of marble, gilded and coloured, . . . which set together . . . present an unexpressible stateliness; and are of marvellous durance. Sandys, Trauailes, p. 24.

Of how short durance was this new made state! Dryden, State of Innocence, v. 1.

The durance of a granite ledge. Emerson, Astrea.

2. Imprisonment; restraint of the person; involuntary confinement of any kind.

What bootes it him from death to be unbouned, To be captived in endless durance Of sorrow and despayre without alleageance? Spenser, F. Q., III. v. 42.

They [the Flemmings] put their Lord in Prison, till with long Durance he at last consented. Baker, Chronicles, p. 122.

I give thee thy liberty, set thee free from durance. Shak., L. L. L., iii. 1.

In durance vile here must I wake and weep. Burns, Epistle from Esopus to Maria.

3†. Any material supposed to be of remarkable durability, as buff-leather; especially, a strong cloth made to replace and partly to imitate buff-leather; a variety of tammy. Sometimes written durant, and also called everlasting.

Your mining niceries—durance petticoats, and silver bodkins. Marston, Jonson, and Chapman, Eastward Ho, i. 1.

As the taylor that out of seven yards stole one and a half of durance. R. Wilson, Three Ladies of London.

Is not a buff-jerkin a most sweet robe of durance? Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 2.

4. A kind of apple. durancy, n. [As durance.] Continuance; lastingness; durance.

The souls ever durancy I sung before, Ystruck with mighty rage. Dr. H. More, Sleep of the Soul, i. 1.

durangite (dū-rān'jit), n. [Durango* (see def.) + *-ite*².] A fluo-arsenate of aluminium, iron, and sodium, occurring in orange-red monoclinic crystals, associated with cassiterite (tin-stone), at Durango, Mexico.

duranset, n. An obsolete form of durance.

durant (dū'rānt), n. [It. durante, a kind of strong cloth, < L. durant(t-s), lasting, ppr. of durare, last: see dure, v.] Same as durance, 3.

durante beneplacito (dū-rāntē bē-nē-plas'i-tō), [ML. NL.: L. durante, abl. of durant(t-s), during, ppr. of durare, last, dure (see dure, v., and during); LL. beneplacitum, abl. of beneplacitum, good pleasure, neut. of beneplacitus, pp. of beneplacere, bene placere, please well: see beneplacit.] During good pleasure.

durante vita (dū-ran'tē vī'tā). [L.: durante, abl. of durant(-t)s, during (see durante beneplacito); vita, abl. of vita, life: see vital.] During life.

duration (dū-rā'shon), n. [ME. duracion. Cf. Pr. duracio = Sp. duracion = Pg. duracão = It. durazione, < ML. duratio(n)-, continuance, perseverance, < L. durare, last: see dure, v.] Continuance in time; also, the length of time during which anything continues: as, the duration of life or of a partnership; the duration of a tone or note in music; the duration of an eclipse.

The distance between any parts of that succession [of ideas], or between the appearance of any two ideas in our minds, is that we call duration.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xiv. 3.

Is there any thing in human life, the duration of which can be called long? Steele, Spectator, No. 153.

It was proposed that the duration of Parliament should be limited. Macaulay.

Relative, apparent, and common time is duration as estimated by the motion of bodies, as by days, months, and years. Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, art. xvii.

darbar, darbar (dēr'bār), n. [Hind. darbār, Turk. darbār, < Pers. darbār, a court, an audience-room, < dar, a door, + bār, admittance, audience, court, tribunal.] 1. An audience-room in the palace of a native prince of India; the audience itself.

He was at once informed that a Rampore citizen had no right to enter the darbar of Jubbul, and was obliged to go out in the rain in the court-yard.

W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 206.

2. A state levee or audience held by the governor-general of India, or by one of the native princes; an official reception.

On January 1, 1877, Queen Victoria was proclaimed Empress of India, at a darbar of unequalled magnificence, held on the historic "ridge" overlooking the Mughal capital of Delhi. Encyc. Brit., XII. 811.

dure (dūr), a. [Sc. also dour; < OF. dur, F. dur = Sp. Pg. It. duro, < L. durus, hard, rough, harsh, insensible, = Ir. dur = Gael. dur, dull, hard, stupid, obstinate, firm, strong, = W. dir, certain, sure, of force, dir, force, certainty, but the Celtic forms, like W. dur, steel, may be borrowed from the Latm.] Hard; rough.

Fielding, Tom Jones, ix. 5.

Dutch foll. See foll.—Dutch gleeke, drink: a jocular allusion to the game of gleeke; as if tipping were the favorite game of Dutchmen. Nares.

Nor could be partaker of any of the good cheer, except it were the liquid part of it, which they call Dutch gleeke, where he played his cards so well, and vied and revied so often, that he had scarce an eye to see withal.

Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote, p. 96.

Dutch gold. See Dutch metal.—Dutch lace, a thick and not very open lace, like a coarse Valenciennes lace, made in the Netherlands, generally by the peasants.—Dutch leaf. See Dutch metal.—Dutch liquid (so named because first made by an association of Dutch chemists), a thin, oily liquid, insoluble in water, having a pleasant, sweetish smell and taste. It is a definite compound, ethylene dichloride (C₂H₄Cl₂), formed by mixing ethylene or olefant gas and chlorine. It also occurs as a by-product in the manufacture of chloral.—Dutch metal, one of the alloys used as a cheap imitation of gold, and sold in the form of leaves, called Dutch leaf or leaf-gold. It is a kind of brass, containing 11 parts of copper to 2 of zinc, and is one of the most malleable of alloys. It is cast in thin plates and then rolled, and afterward beaten into very thin leaves. It is used in bookbinding.—Dutch myrtle, oven, pink. See the nouns.—Dutch pins. See pin.—Dutch roller, rush. See the nouns.—Dutch school, the name applied to a peculiar style of painting which attained its highest development in the Netherlands, characterized by the selection of subjects of a low or commonplace character, as boors drinking, butchers' shops, the materials of the larder, etc., but raised to the highest popularity by admirable imitation and general perfection of execution. Rembrandt, Brouwer, Ostade, and Jan Steen are among the best-known masters of this peculiar school.—Dutch syrup. See the extract.

A kind of syrup called colonial-syrup or Dutch-syrup is brought into commerce from those colonies where sugar is manufactured from sugar-cane.

Thauring, Beer (trans.), p. 217.

Dutch talent (navt.), any piece of nautical work which, while it may answer the purpose, and even show a certain ingenuity, is not done in clever, shipshape style: defined by sailors as "main strength and stupidity."—Dutch tile. See tile.—Dutch white. See white.—Dutch wife, an open frame of ratan or cane, used in hot weather in the Dutch East Indies and other tropical countries to rest the arms and legs upon while in bed.—To talk like a Dutch uncle, to talk with great but kindly severity and directness, as if with the authority and unsparring frankness of an uncle from whom one has expectations.

Milverton . . . began reasoning with the boys, talking to them like a Dutch uncle (I wonder what that expression means) about their cruelty.

Helpe, Animals and their Masters, p. 131.

II. n. 1. The Teutonic or Germanic race; the German peoples generally: used as a plural. Specifically—2. The Low Germans, particularly the people of Holland, or the kingdom of the Netherlands; the Dutchmen; the Hollanders: called specifically the Low Dutch: used as a plural.—3. The High Germans; the inhabitants of Germany; the Germans: formerly called specifically the High Dutch: used as a plural.

Germany is slandered to have sent none to this war [the Crusades] at this first voyage; and that other pilgrims, passing through that country, were mocked by the Dutch, and called fools for their pains. Fuller.

4. The Teutonic or Germanic language, including all its forms. See 5, 6.—5. The language spoken in the Netherlands; the Hollandish language (which differs very slightly from the Flemish, spoken in parts of the adjoining kingdom of Belgium): called distinctively Low Dutch.—6. The language spoken by the Germans; German; High German: formerly, and still occasionally (as in the United States, especially where the two races are mingled), called distinctively High Dutch.—7. The common white clover, Trifolium repens: an abbreviation of Dutch clover.—8. [l. c.] A kind of linen tape.—Pennsylvania Dutch, a mixed dialect, consisting of German intermingled with English, spoken by the descendants of the original German settlers of Pennsylvania.—To beat the Dutch, to be very strange or surprising; excel anything before known or heard of; said of a statement, an occurrence, etc., usually in the form "That beats the Dutch." [Colloq., northern U. S.]

dutch (duch), v. t. [That is, to treat in Dutch fashion: in allusion to the fact that quills were first so prepared in Holland; < Dutch, a.] To clarify and harden by immersing in heated sand, as goose-quills.

Obligatory service; that which ought to be done; that which one is bound by natural, moral, or legal obligation to do or perform.

It doth not stand with the duty which we owe to our heavenly Father, that to the ordinances of our mother the Church we should show ourselves disobedient.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 9.

Take care that your expressions be prudent and safe, consisting with thy other duties.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 664.

In the middle ages fealty to a feudal lord was accounted a duty, and the assertion of personal freedom a crime.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 265.

2. The obligation to do something; the binding or obligatory force of that which is morally right: as, when duty calls, one must obey.

For the parents' iniquity was reuenged, and the duetie of nature performed or satisfied by the child.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 138.

I taught my wife her duty, made her see What it behoved her see and say and do, Feel in her heart and with her tongue declare.

Browning, Ring and Book, I. 227.

O hard, when love and duty clash!

Tennyson, Princess, ii.

It is asserted that we are so constituted that the notion of duty furnishes in itself a natural motive of action of the highest order, and wholly distinct from all the refinements and modifications of self-interest.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 189.

Duty to one's countrymen and fellow-citizens, which is the social instinct guided by reason, is in all healthy communities the one thing sacred and supreme.

Cf. centumvir, decumvir.] In Rom. hist., one of two officers or magistrates united in the same public function. The officers specifically so called were either the highest magistrates of municipal towns or persons appointed for some occasional service, the kind of duty in all cases being indicated by a descriptive term: as, duumviri navales, officers for equipping and repairing the fleet.

duumviracy (dū-um'vī-rā-si), n. [duumvirate: see acy.] The union of two persons in authority or office. [Rare.]

A cunning complicating of Presbyterian and Independent principles and interests together, that they may rule in their duumviracy.

Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 438.

duumviral (dū-um'vī-rāl), a. [= F. duumviral = It. duumvirale, < L. duumviralis, < duumviri: see duumvir and -al.] Pertaining to Roman duumviri, or to a duumvirate.

duumvirate (dū-um'vī-rāt), n. [= F. duumvirat = Sp. duumvirato = Pg. duumvirato = It. duumvirato, < L. duumviratus, < duumviri: see duumvir and -ate.] The union of two men in the same office, or the office, dignity, or government of two men thus associated, as in ancient Rome.

duumviri, n. Latin plural of duumvir.

duvet (dū-vā'), n. [F., < OF. duvet, down, wool, nap.] A quilt or comfortable stuffed with swans' down or eider-down.

dux (duks), n.; pl. duces (dū'sēz). [L., a leader, general, chief: see duke.] 1. A leader; a chief; specifically, the head or chief pupil of a class or division in some public schools. Imp. Dict.—2. In music, the subject or theme of a fugue: distinguished from the comes or answer.

duyker, duykerbok (dū'kēr, -bok), n. [D. duyker, = E. ducker, + bok = E. buck.] The diving-buck, or impoon, Cephalophus mergens, an antelope of South Africa: so called from its habit of plunging through and under the bushes in flight instead of leaping over them. There are several species of Cephalophus, besides the one mentioned, to which the name is also applicable. See cut under Cephalophus.

duyong, n. Same as dugong.

duzine, n. [D. dozijn, a dozen: see dozen.] A body of twelve men, governing a village. [N. Y., colonial, local.]

The patentees are said to have been called the "Twelve Men" or Duzine, and to have had both legislative and judicial powers in town affairs.

Johns Hopkins Univ. Stud., IV. 55.

D. V. An abbreviation of the Latin Deo volente, God willing. See Deo volente.

D-valve (dē'valv), n. A valve for opening and closing the induction and eduction passages of a steam-engine cylinder: so called from its plan resembling the letter D. The usual form of the D-valve is shown in fig. 1, where it is seen detached, and at a, fig. 2, which represents a section of a steam-cylinder and nozzles.

dwale (dwāl), n. [ME. dwale, dwole, error, delusion, also, in later use, dwale, a sleeping-potion, deadly nightshade, < AS. dwola (rarely dwa), ge-dwola, error, delusion, heresy; cf. D. dwaal (in comp.), delusion, = OHG. twāla, MHG. twāle, delay; Icel. dwāl, sleep, lethargy (Haldorsen), dwa, also dwöl, pl. dwalir, a short stay, a stop, pause; Sw. dwa, a trance, ecstasy, = Dan. dvale, torpor, lethargy, a trance (dvale-drik, a sleeping-potion, dvale-ber, mandrake): words variously formed and connected with AS. dwal*, dwol*, dol (= Goth. dvals, etc.), stupid, foolish, dull (see dull), and with the secondary verbs AS. dwelian, mislead, intr. err, dwellan, hinder, mislead, dwelian, remain, dwell, etc.; all ult. from the strong verb represented by AS. dwelan*, pret. dwal*, dwol*, pp. ge-dwolen, mislead: see further under dwell, and cf. dwale, v, dwalim.] 1†. Error; delusion.

The Goddes lamb than cenge sale
This wreched world fra sinful *dwa*le.

Cursor Mundi, l. 12840.

2†. A sleeping-potion; a soporific.

To bedde goth Aleyn, and also Jon,
Ther nas no more, hem needede no *dwa*le.

Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, l. 241.

The frere with his fisk this folke hath enchanted,
And doth men drynke *dwa*le that men dredeth no synne.

Piers Plowman (C), xxiii. 379.

3. The deadly nightshade, Atropa Belladonna, which possesses stupefying or poisonous properties.

*Dwa*le, or sleeping nightshade, hath round blackish stalkes, &c. This kind of nightshade causeth sleep.

Gerarde, Herbal (ed. T. Johnson), ii. 56.

4. In her., a sable or black color.—Deadly dwale, the Acuistis arborescens, a small solanaceous tree of tropical America, nearly allied to Atropa. It bears yellow berries.

dwale (dwāl), v. i.; pret. and pp. *dwa*led, ppr. *dwa*ling. [See dwell.] To mutter deliciously. Dunglison. [Devonshire, Eng.]

dwalm, dwaum (dwām, dwāum), n. [Sc., also written dualm, dwaum; < ME. dwolme*, < AS. dwolma, a confusion, chaos, hence a gulf, chasm (cf. OS. dwalim, delusion, = OHG. dwalm, stupefaction, a stupefying drink), < dwelan*, pp. ge-dwolen, mislead, lead into error: see dwell, *dwa*le, and dull.] A swoon; a sudden fit of sickness.

Hir Majestie . . . This night has had sum dwaumes of swooning.

Letter of Council of State, in Keith's Hist., App., p. 183.

When a child is seized with some undefinable ailment, it is common to say, "It's just some dwaum." Jamieson.

dwang (dwang), n. A strut inserted between the timbers of a floor to stiffen them. [Scotch.]

dwarf (dwārf), n. and a. [ME. dwarf, dwerf, where f represents the changed sound (so in LG. below) of the guttural, which also took a different development in the parallel ME. dwe-rouwe, dwerwe (mod. E. as if dwarrow*; cf. arrow, barrow, etc.), < dwergh, dwerck (whence also mod. dial. durgan), a dwarf, particularly as an attendant, < AS. dwæorg, dwæorch, a dwarf (def. 1), = D. dwer, a dwarf, = MLG. dwerch, dwarck, dwarck = LG. dwarf, a dwarf, contr. dorf, an insignificant person or thing, = OHG. twerg, MHG. twerc, querch, zwerg, G. zwerg, a dwarf, = Icel. dverg = Sw. and Dan. dverg, a dwarf. The mythological sense appears esp. in Scand., and may be the orig. sense.] 1. n. 1. A person of very small size; a human being much below the ordinary stature. True dwarfs (some of the most celebrated of whom have been from 3 to less than 2 feet in height) are usually well formed; but dwarfism is often accompanied by deformity or caused by disproportion of parts. In ancient, medieval, and later times, dwarfs have been in demand as personal attendants upon ladies and noblemen; and the ancient Romans practised methods of dwarfing persons artificially.

Of that Citee was Zacheus the Dwerf, that clomb up in to the Sycomour Tre, for to see our Lord; be cause he was so litlle, he myghte not see him for the peple.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 98.

Behind her farre away a Dwarf did lag,
That lasie seemd, in being ever last.

Spenser, F. Q., l. i. 6.

Beneath an oak, mossed o'er by eld,
The Baron's Dwarf his course held.

Scott, L. of L. M., ii. 31.

2. An animal or a plant much below the ordinary size of its species.—3. In Scand. myth., a diminutive and generally deformed being, dwelling in rocks and hills, and distinguished for skill in working metals.

II. a. Of small stature or size; of a size smaller than that common to its kind or species: as, a dwarf palm; dwarf trees. Among gardeners dwarf is used to distinguish fruit-trees of which the branches spring from the stem near the ground from riders or standards, the original stocks of which are several feet in height.

In the northern wall was a dwarf door, leading by break-neck stairs to a pigeon-hole.

R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 92.

Many of the dwarf bicycles now offered for sale, though they have merits of their own, are anything but safeties.

Bury and Hiltner, Cycling, p. 23.

Similar to it [B. Aquifolium], but different in foliage and dwarfer in growth, is B. repens.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI. 292.

Dwarf bay, bilberry, cherry, etc. See the nouns.—Dwarf dove, a small ground-dove of the genus Columbigallina (or Columbigallina). There are several species, all American, the best-known being C. passerina, common in southern parts of the United States. See cut under ground-dove.—Dwarf lemur, a small lemur of the genus Microcebus (which see).—Dwarf male, in algæ of the group Odogonice, a small, short-lived plant consisting of only a few cells, developed in the vicinity of the oogonium from a peculiar zoospore, and producing antherozoids.—Dwarf quail, a small quail of the genus Excalfactoria, as the Chinese dwarf quail, E. sinensis.—Dwarf snake, a serpent of the family Calamariidae (which see), of diminutive size, and with non-distensible jaws, very generally distributed over the globe, found under stones and logs. There are several genera and species.—Dwarf thrush, a small variety of the hermit-thrush, found in the Western States; Turdus nanus.—Dwarf wall, specifically, a wall of less height than a story of a building. The term is generally applied to walls which support the sleeper-joists under the lowest floor of a building.

dwarf (dwārf), v. [dwārf, n.] I. trans. 1. To hinder from growing to the natural size; make or keep small; prevent the dus development, or of; stunt.

Thus it was that the national character of the Scotch was, in the seventeenth century, dwarfed and mutilated.

Buckle, Civilization, II. v.

The habit of brooding over a single idea is calculated to dwarf the soundest mind.

Dr. Ray, in Huxley and Youmans' Physiol., § 508.

The window heads have been dwarfed down to mere framings for masks.

J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 124.

You may dwarf a man to the mere stump of what he ought to be, and yet he will put out green leaves.

G. W. Cable, Grandissimes, p. 331.

2. To cause to appear less than reality; cause to look or seem small by comparison: as, the cathedral dwarfs the houses around it.

The larger love

That dwarfs the petty love of one to one.

Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

The mind stretches an hour to a century, and dwarfs an age to an hour.

Emerson, Old Age.

And who could blame the generous weakness
Which, only to thyself unjust,
So overpowered the work of others,
And dwarfed thy own with self-distrust?

Whittier, A Memorial, M. A. C.

II. intrans. To become less; become dwarfish or stunted.

As it grew, it dwarfed. Buckle, Civilization, II. ii.

The region where the herbage began to dwarf.

L. Wallace, Ben-Hur, p. 7.

dwarfish (dwārf'ish), a. [dwārf + -ish.] 1. Like a dwarf; below the common stature or size; diminutive: as, a dwarfish animal; a dwarfish shrub.—2. Slight; petty; despicable.

The king . . . is well prepared

To whip this dwarfish war, these pigmy arms,
From out the circle of his territories.

Shak., K. John, v. 2.

dwarfishly (dwārf'ish-li), adv. Like a dwarf; in a dwarfish manner.

The painter, the sculptor, the composer, the epic rhapsodist, the orator, all partake one desire, namely, to express themselves symmetrically and abundantly, not dwarfishly and fragmentarily.

Emerson, The Poet.

dwarfishness (dwārf'ish-ness), n. Smallness of stature; littleness of size.

Science clearly explains this dwarfishness produced by great abstraction of heat; showing that, food and other things being equal, it unavoidably results.

H. Spencer, Education, p. 247.

dwarfing (dwārf'ing), n. [dwārf + dim. -ing.] A very small dwarf; a pygmy.

Sylvester, The Woodman's Bear.

Waterhouse, Apol. for Learning (1653), p. 65.

dye¹ (dī), v. t.; and pp. dyed, ppr. dyeing. [Formerly also die; < ME. dyen, dien, deyen, < AS. deagian, deagan, dye, color, < deag, deah, a dye, color, < deagan*, a strong verb found only once, in pret. deog, dye, tinge, prob. (like tinge, < L. tingere), orig. wet, moisten, and allied to AS. dedu, E. dew, and so to E. *dag*¹, dew, and deg, moisten, sprinkle: see *dew*¹.] 1. To fix a color or colors in the substance of by immersion in a properly prepared bath; impregnate with coloring matter held in solution. The matters used for dyeing are obtained from vegetables, animals, and minerals; and the subjects to which they are applied are porous materials in general, but especially wool, cotton, silk, linen, hair, skins, feathers, ivory, wood, and marble. The great diversity of tint obtained in dyeing is the result of the combination of two or more simple coloring substances with one another or with certain chemical reagents. To render the colors permanent, the subsequent application of a mordant, or the precipitation of the coloring matter by the direct use of a mordant, is usually required; but when aniline and some other artificial dyes are used, no mordant is necessary. The superficial application of pigments to tissues by means of adhesive vehicles such as oil and albumen, as in painting or in some kinds of calico-printing, does not constitute dyeing, because the coloring bodies so applied do not penetrate the fiber, and are not intimately incorporated with it. 2. To overspread with color, as by effusion; tinge or stain in general.

I cannot rest
Until the white rose that I wear be dyed
Even in the lukewarm blood of Henry's heart.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., i. 2.
Many o' Murry's men lay gaspin,
An' dyit thi ground w' theire bleid.
Battle of Corbie (Child's Ballads, VII. 213).
Their [maidens'] cheeks were dyed with vermilion.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 807.
Over the front door trailed a luxuriant woodbine, now dyed by the frosts into a dark claret.
S. Judd, Margaret, ii. 8.

To dye in grain. See *grain*¹.—To dye scarlett, to drink deep; drink till the face becomes scarlet.
dye¹ (dī), n. [*< ME. *deye, deghe (not found), < AS. deag, deah, a dye, color: see the verb, which is orig. from the noun.] 1. Coloring matter in solution; a coloring liquor.

A kind of shell-fish, having in the midst of his jaws a certain white vein, which containeth that precious liquor: a dye of sovereign estimation. Sandys, Travels, p. 168.
2. Color; hue; tint; tinge.

And creeping shrubs of thousand dyes
Waved in the west wind's summer sighs.
Scott, L. of the L., i. 11.

dye², v. i. An obsolete spelling of *die*¹.
dye³, n. An obsolete spelling of *die*³.

You shall no more deal with the hollow dye
Or the frail card. B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

dye-bath (dī'bāth), n. A bath prepared for use in dyeing; a solution of coloring matter in which substances to be colored are immersed.
Oxalic acid, like acetic acid, is used for preparing dye-baths. C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 708.

dye-beck (dī'bek), n. Same as dye-bath.
The dye-beck consists of alizarin and tannin.
Ure, Dict., IV. 915.

dye-house¹ (dī'hous), n. A building in which dyeing is carried on.

dye-house² (dī'hous), n. [A dial. var. of dye-house.] A milk-house or dairy. Grose. [Prov. Eng.]

dyeing (dī'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *dye*¹, v.] The operation or practice of fixing colors in solution in textile and other porous substances.

dye-pot (dī'pot), n. A dye-vat.

There were clothes there which were to receive different colors. All these Jesus threw into one dye-pot, . . . and taking them out, each [piece] was dyed as the dyer wished. Stowe, Origin of the Books of the Bible, p. 222.

dyer (dī'ér), n. [< ME. dyere, diere, deyer, < dyen, etc., dye: see *dye*¹, v.] One whose occupation is to dye cloth, skins, feathers, etc.

Almost . . . my nature is subdued
To what it works in, like the dyer's hand.
Shak., Sonnets, cxi.

Dyers' spirit, tin tetrachloride, known in commerce as oxymuriate of tin (SnCl₄ + 5H₂O). It is a valuable mordant.

dyer's-broom (dī'érz-bröm), n. The plant Gemista tinctoria, used to make a green dye. Also called dyeweed.

dyer's-greenweed (dī'érz-grēn'wēd), n. Same as dyer's-broom.

dyer's-moss (dī'érz-môs), n. The lichen Rocella tinctoria. Same as archil, 2.

dyer's-weed (dī'érz-wēd), n. The woad, weld, or yellow-weed, Reseda luteola, affording a yellow dye, and cultivated in Europe on that account.

dyester (dī'stér), n. [*< dye*¹ + -ster.] A dyer. [Scotch.]

dyestone (dī'stôn), n. A red ferruginous limestone occurring in Tennessee, used occasionally in the place of a dye, although insoluble and not properly a dye.—Dyestone ore, an iron ore of great economical importance in the United States. Also called fossil, dyestone fossil, flazseed, and Clinton ore. See Clinton ore, under ore.

dyestuff (dī'stuf), n. In com., any dyewood, lichen, powder, or dye-cake used in dyeing and staining. The most important dyestuffs are cochineal, madder, indigo, logwood, fustic, quercitron-bark, and the various preparations of aniline. Also called dyeware.

dye-trial (dī'tri'al), n. An experiment with coloring matters to determine their value as dyes. Such experiments are usually performed by dyeing small pieces of yarn or fabric, of equal size, in beakers, one of which contains the coloring matter in question, the other a standard of the same colorant.

Never less than two dye-trials should be carried out at once, viz., one with the new colouring matter, the other with a colouring matter of known value, which is taken as the "type." Benedikt, Coal-tar Colours (trans.), p. 57.

dye-vat (dī'vat), n. A bath containing dyes, and fitted with an apparatus for immersing the fabrics to be colored.

dyeware (dī'wēr), n. Same as dyestuff.

The reaction which ensues is not produced by any other dye-ware. Ure, Dict., IV. 354.

dyeweed (dī'wēd), n. Same as dyer's-broom.

dyewood (dī'wūd), n. Any wood from which dye is extracted.

dye-works (dī'wērks), n. sing. or pl. An establishment in which dyeing is carried on.

dyogram (dī'gō-gram), n. [< Gr. dō(vauis), power, + γω(via), angle, + γράφω, anything written.] A diagram containing a curve generated by the motion of a line drawn from a fixed origin, and representing in direction and magnitude the horizontal component of the force of magnetism on a ship's compass-needle while the ship makes a complete circuit. The course of the ship is marked on the curve. There are two kinds of dyogram, according as it is supposed to be fixed in space during the rotation of the ship or fixed on the ship.

dying (dī'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *die*¹, v.] The act of expiring; loss of life; death.

Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body. 2 Cor. iv. 10.

dying (dī'ing), p. a. [< ME. dyinge, dying, with older term. diend, diand, etc.; *ppr. of die*¹, v. In some uses, as dying hour, dying bed, etc. (deaths, 4, 5), the word is the verbal noun used attributively.] 1. Physically decaying; failing from life; approaching death or dissolution; moribund: as, a dying man; a dying tree.

The noise of battle hurried in the air,
. . . and dying men did groan. Shak., J. C., ii. 2.

2. Mortal; destined to death; perishable: as, dying bodies.

I preached as never sure to preach again,
And as a dying man to dying men.
Baxter, Love breathing Thanks and Praise.

3. Drawing to a close; fading away; failing; languishing: as, the dying year; a dying light.
That strain again;—it had a dying fall.
Shak., T. N., i. 1.

Where the dying night-lamp flickers.
Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

4. Given, uttered, or manifested just before death: as, dying words; a dying request; dying love.

I do prophesy the election lights
On Fortinbras; he has my dying voice.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 2.

Sir, let me speak next,
And let my dying words be better with you
Than my dull living actions.
Beau. and Fl., Philaster, v. 3.

5. Pertaining to or associated with death: as, a dying hour; a dying bed.

He served his country as knight of the shire to his dying day. Steele, Spectator, No. 109.

Dying declaration. See declaration.
dyingly (dī'ing-li), adv. In a dying or languishing manner.

dyingness (dī'ing-nes), n. The state of dying; hence, a state simulating the approach of death, real or affected; affected languor or faintness; languishment.

Tenderness becomes me best, a sort of dyingness; you see that picture, Foible—a swimmingness in the eyes.
Congreve, Way of the World, iii. 5.

dyke, n. and v. A less proper spelling of dike.
dykehopper (dik'hop'ér), n. The wheatear, Saxicola oenanthe. Swainson. [Local, Eng. (Stirling).]

dynactinometer (di-nak-ti-nom'e-tér), n. [< Gr. dō(vauis), power, + ἀκτίς (aktis), a ray, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the intensity of actinic power, or for comparing the quickness of lenses.

dynagraph (dī'na-gráf), n. [Short for dynamograph, q. v.] A machine for reporting the condition of a railroad-track, the speed of a train, and the power (and consumption of coal and water) used in traversing a given distance. The most important machine of this class was built by Professor Dudley, and is employed in examining road-beds in all parts of the United States. It consists of a paper ribbon arranged to pass under a series of recording pens, and moved by means of gearing from one of the axles of the car in which it is placed. The mechanical recording appliances give the tension on the draw-bar, showing the resistance of the car, its speed, the distance traveled absolutely, and in a given number of seconds, minutes, and hours. The oscillations of the car, also the level of the rails, the alignment, the condition of the joints of the rails, and the elevations of the rails at curves, are all mechanically traced on the paper band. Besides this, by simple electrical connections, the amount of water and coal consumed in the engine, the pressure of the steam, the mile-posts, stations, etc., are recorded from the car or from the engine, and all these records appear side by side upon the paper. See seismograph.

dynam (dī'nam), n. [< Gr. dō(vauis), power, might, strength, faculty, capacity, force, etc., < dō(vauis), be able, capable, strong enough (to do), pass for, signify, perhaps allied to L. durus, hard: see dure, a.] 1. A unit of work, equal to a weight of one pound raised through one foot; a foot-pound.—2. A force, or a force and a couple, the resultant of all the forces acting together on a body. Also spelled dynamie.

Dynamene (dī-nam'e-nē), n. [NL., < Gr. dō(vauis), fem. of dō(vauis), ppr. of dō(vauis), be able (> dō(vauis), power): see dynam.] 1. A genus of brachyurous decapod crustaceans, of the family Dromiidae.—2. A genus of ecalyptoblastic hydroids, of the family Sertulariidae. D. pumila is an example.—3. A genus of spur-heeled cuckoos: same as Eudynamis. Stephens. [Not in use].—4. A genus of isopods, of the family Sphaeromidae.—5. A genus of lepidopterous insects. Hübner, 1816.

dynameter (dī-nam'e-tér), n. [A contr. of dynamometer, which is differently applied: see dynamometer.] An instrument for determining the magnifying power of telescopes. It consists of a small tube with a transparent plate, exactly divided, which is fixed to the tube of a telescope, in order to measure the diameter of the distinct image of the object-glass.

dynametric, dynametrical (di-na-met'rik, -rikal), a. [< dynameter + -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to a dynameter.

dynamic (di-nam'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. dō(vauis), powerful, efficacious, < dō(vauis), power: see dynam.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to mechanical forces not in equilibrium: opposed to static.—2. Pertaining to mechanical forces, whether in equilibrium or not; involving the consideration of forces. By extension.—3. Causal; effective; motive; involving motion or change: often used vaguely.

The direct action of nature as a dynamic agent is powerful on the language of savages, but gradually becomes insensible as civilization advances.

W. K. Sullivan, Int. to O'Curry's Anc. Irish, p. viii.
Action is dynamic existence.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 482.

They [Calvinists] teach a spiritual, real, or dynamic and effective presence of Christ in the Eucharist for believers only, while unworthy communicants receive no more than the consecrated elements for their own judgment.

Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 165.

4. In the Kantian philos., relating to the reason of existence of an object of experience.—Dynamic category, in the Kantian philos., a category which is the concept of dynamic relation.—Dynamic electricity, current electricity. See electricity.—Dynamic equivalent of heat. See equivalent.—Dynamic geology, that branch of the science of geology which has as its object the study of the nature and mode of action of the agencies by which geological changes are and have been effected. See geology.—Dynamic head. See head.—Dynamic murmurs, cardiac murmurs not caused by valvular incompetence or stenosis, but by anemia or an unusual configuration of the internal surface of the heart, as where a chorda tendinea is so placed as to give rise to a murmur.—Dynamic relations, causal relations; especially, the relations between substance and accident, between cause and effect, and between interacting subjects.—Dynamic synthesis, in the Kantian philos., a synthesis of heterogeneous elements necessarily belonging together.

When the pure concepts of the understanding are applied to every possible experience, their synthesis is either mathematical or dynamical, for it is directed partly to the intuition only, partly to the existence of the phenomenon.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Max Müller.

Dynamic theory, a theory by which Kant endeavored to explain the nature of matter or the mode of its formation. According to this theory, all matter was originated by two antagonistic and mutually counteracting principles called attraction and repulsion, all the predicates of which are referred to motion.—Dynamic theory of nature. (a) A theory which seeks to explain nature from forces, especially from forces of expansion and contraction (as the Stoics did), opposed to a mechanical theory which starts with matter only. (b) The doctrine that some other original principle besides matter must be supposed to account for the phenomena of the universe.—Dynamic theory of the soul, the metaphysical doctrine that the soul consists in an action or tendency to action, and not in an existence at rest.—Dynamic theory of the tides, a theory of the tides in which the general form of the formulas is determined from the solution of a problem in dynamics, the values of the coefficients of the different terms being then altered to suit the observations; opposed to the statical theory, which first supposes the sea to be in equilibrium under the forces to which it is subjected, and then modifies the epoch to suit the observations.—Dynamic viscosity. See viscosity.

II. n. 1. A moral force; an efficient incentive.

We hope and pray that it may act as a spiritual dynamic on the churches and upon all the benevolent in our land. Missionary Herald, Nov., 1879.

2. The science which teaches how to calculate motions in accordance with the laws of force: same as dynamics.

dynamical (di-nam'i-kal), a. Same as dynamic. The dynamical theory [of the tides]. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 355.

Dynamical coefficient of viscosity. See coefficient.

dynamically (di-nam'i-kal-i), adv. In a dynamic manner; as regards dynamics.

Dynamically, the only difference between carbonate of ammonia and protoplasm which can be called fundamental, is the greater molecular complexity and consequent instability of the latter. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 433.

dynamics (di-nam'iks), n. [Pl. of dynamic: see -ics. Cf. LL. dynamicus, dynamicus, < Gr. δυναμική (sc. τέχνη, art), fem. of δυναμικός, dynamic.] 1. The mathematical theory of force; also (until recently the common acceptance), the theory of forces in motion; the science of deducing from given circumstances (masses, positions, velocities, forces, and constraints) the motions of a system of particles.

The science of motion is divided into two parts: the accurate description of motion, and the investigation of the circumstances under which particular motions take place.

That part of the science which tells us about the circumstances under which particular motions take place is called dynamics. . . Dynamics are again divided into two branches: the study of those circumstances under which it is possible for a body to remain at rest is called statics, and the study of the circumstances of actual motion is called kinetics. W. K. Clifford.

[What is here called kinetics has until recently been called dynamics.]

The hope of science at the present day is to express all phenomena in symbols of Dynamics. G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 283.

2. The moving moral or physical forces of any kind, or the laws which relate to them.

The empirical laws of society are of two kinds; some are uniformities of coexistence, some of succession. According as the science is occupied in ascertaining and verifying the former sort of uniformities or the latter, M. Comte gives it the title of Social Statics or of Social Dynamics. J. S. Mill, Logic, VI. x. § 5.

These are then appropriately followed by the dynamics of the subject, or the institution in action in many grave controversies and many acute crises of history. Atlantic Monthly, LVIII. 418.

Dynamics of music, the science of the variation and contrast of force or loudness in musical sounds.—Geological dynamics, that branch of geology which treats of the nature and mode of operation of all kinds of physical agents or forces that have at any time, and in any manner, affected the surface and interior of the earth.—Rigid dynamics, the dynamics of rigid bodies, in which only ordinary differential equations occur.

dynamism (di'na-mizm), n. [Gr. δῡναμις, power (see dynami), + -ism.] 1. The doctrine that besides matter some other material principle—a force in some sense—is required to explain the phenomena of nature. The term is applied—(a) to the doctrines of some of the Ionic philosophers, who held to some such principles as love and hate to explain the origin of motion; (b) to the doctrine adopted by Leibnitz that substance consists in the capacity for action; (c) to the doctrine of Taft that mechanical energy is substance; and (d) to the widely current doctrine that the universe contains nothing not explicable by means of the doctrine of energy.

2. The mode of being of mechanical force or energy.

Who does not see the contradiction of requiring a substance for that which by its definition is not substantial at all, but pure dynamism? G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. ii. § 2.

Dynamism would be more appropriate than Materialism as a designation of the modern scientific movement, the idea of inertia having given place to that of an equilibrium of forces. J. M. Rigg, Mind, XII. 557.

dynamist (di'na-mist), n. [As dynam-ism + -ist.] A believer in dynamism.

Thus I admit, with the pure dynamist, that the material universe, or successive material universes, as manifestations of matter and motion, are concatenated with time, are born, run their course, and fade away, as do the clouds of air. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 803.

dynamistic (di-na-mis'tik), a. Pertaining to the doctrine of force.

It is usual (and convenient) to speak of two kinds of monarchianism—the dynamistic and the modalistic. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 719.

dynamitard (di'na-mi-tārd'), n. [F. dynamitard; as dynamite + -ard.] Same as dynamiter.

If Ireland is to be turned into a Crown Colony, she must be put under martial law; and even that will be no defence against the attacks of dynamitards by whom we may be struck at home. British Quarterly Rev., LXXXIII. 411.

The associate guild of assassins—the nihilist and the dynamitard. N. A. Rev., CXXXVIII. 344.

dynamite (di'na-mit), n. [Gr. δῡναμις, power (see dynami), + -ite.] An explosive of great power, consisting of a mixture of nitroglycerin with some absorbent such as sawdust, or a certain silicious earth from Oberlohe in Hanover. The object of the mixture is to diminish the sensitiveness of nitroglycerin to slight shock, and so to facilitate its carriage without impairing its explosive quality. The disruptive force of dynamite is estimated at about eight times that of gunpowder. Dynamite may be ignited with a match, and will burn quietly with a bright flame without any explosion. Large quantities have been known to fall 20 feet on a hard surface without explosion. It explodes with certainty when ignited by a percussion fuse containing fulminating mercury.

dynamite (di'na-mit), v. t.; pret. and pp. dynamited, ppr. dynamiting. [Gr. dynamite, n.] 1. To mine or charge with dynamite in order to prevent the approach of an enemy, or for destructive purposes.

The military authorities of Pretoria had caused a rumor to go forth that some of the buildings and roads were dynamited, and this deterred the Boers from entering the town, which, as a matter of fact, was not dynamited at all. Athenaeum, No. 3016, p. 201.

2. To blow up or destroy by or as if by dynamite.

It appears from the letters that the American Republic has been dynamited, and upon its ruins a socialist republic established. Science, X. 92.

His [Prince Alexander's of Bulgaria] people . . . are not at all inclined to dynamite him, which is more than can be said for the Czar. Times (London), April 28, 1886.

dynamite-gun (di'na-mit-gun), n. A gun constructed for propelling dynamite, nitroglycerin, or other high explosives, by means of steam or compressed air under high tension.

dynamiter (di'na-mi-tēr), n. [Gr. dynamite + -er.] One who uses, or is in favor of using, dynamite and similar explosives for unlawful purposes; specifically, a political agitator who resorts to or advocates the use of dynamite and the indiscriminate destruction of life and property for the purpose of coercing a government or a party by terror.

Surely no plea of justification could absolve the dynamiter from the eternal consequences of his own infernal deeds. N. A. Rev., CXL. 387.

The recent explosions on the underground railways were the work of . . . dynamiters.

Dynamiters subvented by Parisian fanatics were to appear in Metz. Nineteenth Century, XXII. 421.

dynamitical (di-na-mit'i-kal), a. [Gr. dynamite + -ical.] Having to do with dynamite; violently explosive or destructive.

Like certain dynamitical critics, he is satisfied with destruction, and his attitude towards constitutional formulas is not unlike that of the dynamitical critic towards Constitutions—British and other. Nature, XXXIV. 25.

dynamitically (di-na-mit'i-kal-i), adv. By means, or as by means, of dynamite; with explosive violence.

The Irish attempts, at New York, Paris, and elsewhere, dynamitically to blow up England on behalf of Ireland. The Congregationalist, Feb. 17, 1887.

dynamiting (di'na-mi-ting), n. [Verbal n. of dynamite, v.] The practice of destroying or terrorizing by means of dynamite.

The question is, whether the law permits dynamiting, or whether it will stop dynamiting at the place where it is started, which is the only place where it can be stopped. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 426.

dynamitism (di'na-mi-tizm), n. [Gr. dynamite + -ism.] The use of dynamite and similar explosives in the indiscriminate destruction of life and property for purposes of coercion; any political theory or scheme involving the use of such destructives.

Unqualified repudiation of assassination and dynamitism. The American, VI. 36.

dynamization (di'na-mi-zā'shon), n. [Gr. dynamize + -ation.] 1. Dynamic development; increase of power in anything; dynamogeny: as, dynamization of nerve-force.—2. In homeopathy, the extreme trituration of medicines with a view to increase their efficiency or strength.

dynamize (di'na-miz), v. t.; pret. and pp. dynamized, ppr. dynamizing. [Gr. δῡναμις, power (see dynami), + -ize.] In homeopathy, to increase the efficiency or strength of (medicines) by extreme trituration.

Dynamizing of medicinal substances.

Encyc. Brit., XII. 127.

dynamo (di'na-mō), n. An abbreviation of dynamo-electric machine. See electric.

The machines were driven by a Cummer engine of about a hundred horse-power, which furnished power for other dynamos. Science, III. 177.

Characteristic of a dynamo. See characteristic.—Series dynamo, a dynamo in which the whole current generated in the armature is passed through the coil of the field-magnets.—Shunt dynamo, a dynamo in which only a part of the entire current generated by the rotating armature is applied to excite the field-magnets.

dynamo-electric, dynamo-electrical (di'na-mō-ēlek'trik, -tri-kal), a. [Gr. δῡναμις, power (see dynami), + ηλεκτρικός, electric, electrical.] Producing force by means of electricity: as, a dynamo-electric machine; also, produced by electric force.—Dynamo-electric machine. See electric.

dynamogenesis (di'na-mō-jen'ē-sis), n. Same as dynamogeny.

dynamogenic (di'na-mō-jen'ik), a. [Gr. dynamogeny + -ic.] Pertaining to dynamogeny.

The influence thus manifested is dynamogenic. Dr. Brown-Séquard.

dynamogeny (di-na-moj'e-ni), n. [Gr. δῡναμις, power (see dynami), + γενεῖα, < γενής, producing: see geny.] In psychic science, production of increased nervous activity; dynamization of nerve-force. Also dynamogenesis.

dynamograph (di-nam'ō-grāf), n. [Gr. δῡναμις, power (see dynami), + γράφειν, write.] An instrument combining an elliptic spring and a register to indicate the muscular power exerted by the hand of a person compressing it.

dynamometer (di-na-mom'e-tēr), n. [Contr. dynameter, q. v.; < Gr. δῡναμις, power (see dynami), + μέτρον, a measure.] An apparatus for measuring the amount of force expended by men, animals, or motors in moving a load, operating machines, towing vessels, etc.; a power-measurer. Dynamometers use the resistance of springs, weights, and friction as a test, each comparison being made with a known weight or force that will overcome the resistance of the spring, raise the weight, or balance the friction. One of the simplest forms is a steel-yard in which the force to be measured is applied to the shorter arm while a weight is balanced on the longer graduated arm. The most common form of spring-dynamometer consists of an elliptical spring that may be compressed or pulled apart in the direction of its longer axis, with an index and scale, and sometimes a recording pencil, to indicate the amount of force exerted. In the apparatus depending on friction a brake is applied to the face of a pulley, and the force is measured by the resistance of the brake to the motion of the pulley. In other forms fast and loose pulleys are placed side by side and connected by weighted levers, a certain amount of force being required to lift the lever and communicate motion to both pulleys. In still other forms coiled springs are used to test a direct strain, as in moving a load or in towing. There are other forms used to test the recoil of guns and the explosive force of gunpowder. In the Batchelder dynamometer two pairs of bevel-wheels are interposed between the receiving and the transmitting pulleys, one pair in line with the pulleys, the other pair at right angles to them and in line with a balanced scale-beam. The force and resistance transmitted through the gears tend to turn the scale-beam about the line of the pulley-shafts, and this must be resisted by a weight upon the scale-beam, which is the measure of the force transmitted. The dynamometer is not a direct indicator of power exerted or of work performed; but when the velocity with which resistance is overcome or force transmitted has been determined by other means, this velocity, and the measure of the force obtained by the dynamometer, are the data for computing the power or work. See balance-dynamometer, crusher-gage, piezometer, and pressure-gage.—Dynamometer coupling, a device inserted in a shaft by means of which the power transmitted may be measured.

dynamometric, dynamometrical (di'na-mō-met'rik, -ri-kal), a. [Gr. dynamometer + -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to or made with the aid of a dynamometer.

dynamometry (di-na-mom'e-tri), n. [Gr. dynamometer + -y.] The act or art of using the dynamometer.

Dynamostes (di-na-mō'stēz), n. [NL. (Pascoe, 1857), < Gr. δῡναμις, power, strength.] A genus of longicorn beetles, of the family Cerambycidae. There is but one species, D. audax, of the East Indies.

dynast (di'nast), n. [= F. dynaste = Pg. dynasta = Sp. lt. dinasta, < L. dynastes (ML. also dynasta*), < Gr. δυναστής, a lord, master, ruler, < δυνασθαι, be able, strong: see dynam.] A ruling prince; a permanent or hereditary ruler.

Philosophers, dynasts, monarchs, all were involved and overshadowed in this mist. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 599.

The ancient family of Des Ewes, dynasts or lords of the dition of Kessell. A. Wood, Athenæ Oxon.

This Thracian dynast is mentioned as an ally of the Athenians against Philip in an inscription found some years ago in the Acropolis at Athens.

B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, p. 241.

dynastat (di-nas'tat), n. [ML. dynasta*, L. dynastes, < Gr. δυναστής, see dynast.] Same as dynast.

Wherefore did his mother, the virgin Mary, give such praise to God in her prophetic song, that he had now by the coming of Christ out down dynastas, or proud monarchs? Milton, Tenure of Kings and Magistrates.

Dynastes (di-nas'tez), n. [NL., < Gr. δυναστής, a ruler: see dynast.] A genus of lamellicorn beetles, of the family Scarabæidæ or typical of a family Dynastidæ. It is restricted to forms having the external maxillary lobes with 3 or 4 small median teeth, no lateral prothoracic projections, and the last tarsal joint arcuate and clubbed. The type is D. hercules, the Hercules-beetle, the largest known true insect, having a length of about 6 inches, of which the curved prothoracic horn is nearly one half.

dynastic (di-nas'tik), a. [= F. dynastique = Sp. dinástico; cf. D. G. dynastisch = Dan. Sw. dynastisk, < Gr. δυναστικός, < δυναστής, a ruler: see dynast.] Relating or pertaining to a dynasty or line of kings.

In Holland dynastic interests were betraying the welfare of the republic. Bancroft, Hist. Const., II. 365.

The civil wars of the Roses had been a barren period in English literature, because they had been merely dynastic squabbles, in which no great principles were involved which could shake all minds with controversy and heat them to intense conviction.

Lovell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 150.

The dynastic traditions of Europe are rooted and grounded in the distant past.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 15.

dynasticism (di-nas'ti-sizm), n. [cf. dynastic + -ism.] Kingly or imperial power handed down from father to son; government by successive members of the same line or family.

In the Old World dynasticism is plainly in a state of decadence. Goldwin Smith, Pop. Sci. Mo., XX. 628.

Dynastidæ (di-nas'ti-dæ), n. pl. [NL., < Dynastes + -idæ.] A family of lamellicorn beetles, taking name from the genus Dynastes, and containing a few forms remarkable for their great size and strength. They are chiefly tropical, and burrow in the ground. The Hercules-beetle, elephant-beetle, and atlas-beetle are examples. The group is usually merged in Scarabæidæ.

dynastidan (di-nas'ti-dan), n. [cf. Dynastidæ + -an.] One of the Dynastidæ.

dynasty (di'nas'ti), n.; pl. dynasties (-tiz). [= D. G. dynastie = Dan. Sw. dynasti, < F. dynastie = Sp. dinastia = Pg. dynastia = It. dinastia, < ML. dynastia, dynastia, < Gr. δυναστεία, lordship, rule, < δυναστής, a lord, master, ruler: see dynast.] 1. A government; a sovereignty.—2. A race or succession of sovereigns of the same line or family governing a particular country: as, the successive dynasties of Egypt or of France.

At some time or other, to be sure, all the beginners of dynasties were chosen by those who called them to govern. Burke, Rev. in France.

It is to Manetho that we are indebted for that classification called by the Greeks Dynasties, a word applied generally to those sets of kings which belonged to one family, or who were derived from one original stock. These Dynasties were named as well as numbered, and their names were derived from the town, or region, whence the founder came or where he lived.

H. S. Osborn, Ancient Egypt, p. 49.

dyne (din), n. [Abbr. of dynam, < Gr. δύναμις, power: see dynam.] In physics, the unit of force in the centimeter-gram-second system, being that force which, acting on a gram for one second, generates a velocity of a centimeter per second; the product of a gram into a centimeter, divided by the square of a mean solar second. The force of a dyne is about equivalent to the weight of a milligram. It requires a force of about 445,000 dynes to support one pound of matter on the earth's surface in latitude 45°.

The dyne is about 1.02 times the weight of a milligramme at any part of the earth's surface; and the megadyne is about 1.02 times the weight of a kilogramme.

J. D. Everett, Units and Phys. Const., p. 167.

dyocætriacontahedron, dyokaitriakontahedron (di'ô-sê-, di'ô-ki-tri-â-kon-tâ-hê'dron), n.

dyophysitic (di'ô-fî-zit'ik), a. [cf. Gr. δύο, = E. two, + φύσις, nature, + -ιτε2 + -ic. Cf. diphy-sita.] Having two natures.

They agree in the attempt to substitute a Christ-personality with one consciousness and one will for a dyophysitic Christ with a double consciousness and a double will.

Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 94.

dyotheism (di'ô-thê-izm), n. [cf. Gr. δύο, = E. two, + θεός, a god, + -ism. Cf. ditheism, the preferable form.] The doctrine that there are two Gods, or a system which recognizes such a doctrine; dualism.

It (Arianism) starts with a zeal for the unity and the unchangeableness of God; and yet ends in dyotheism, the doctrine of an uncreated God and a created God.

Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 58.

dyothelism (di'ô-thê-lizm), n. [Also diothelism; < Gr. δύο, = E. two, + θέλω, will, + -ism.] The doctrine that Christ had two wills.

dyothelite (di'ô-thê-lit), n. and a. [As dyotheism + -ite2.] I. n. A believer in dyothelism. II. a. Pertaining to dyothelism.

The reply of the Western Church was promptly given in the unambiguously dyothelite decrees of the Lateran synod held by Martin I. in 649. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 758.

dys- [cf. L. dys-, < Gr. δυσ-, an inseparable prefix, opposed to eu- (see eu-), much like E. mis- or un-, always with notion of 'hard, bad, unlucky,' etc., destroying the good sense of a word or increasing its bad sense; = Skt. dus- = Zend dush- = Ir. do- = Goth. tus-, tus- = OHG. zur- = Icel. tor-, hard, difficult.] An inseparable prefix in words of Greek origin, signifying 'hard, difficult, bad, ill,' and implying some difficulty, imperfection, inability, or privation in the act, process, or thing denoted by the word of which it forms a part.

dysæsthesia (dis-es-thê-si-â), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσαισθησία, insensibility, < δυσαισθητός, insensible, < δύσ-, hard, + αἰσθητός, verbal adj. of αἰσθάνεσθαι, perceive, feel.] In pathol., impaired, diminished, or difficult sensation; dullness of feeling; numbness; insensibility in some degree. Also spelled dyæsthesia.

dysæsthetic (dis-es-thet'ik), a. [cf. dysæsthesia, after æsthetic.] Affected by, exhibiting, or relating to dysæsthesia. Also spelled dyæsthetic.

dysanalty (dis-an-â-lit), n. [cf. Gr. δυσανάλυτος, hard to undo, < δύσ-, hard, + ἀνάλυτος, dissoluble: see analytic.] A mineral related to pyrochlore, occurring in small black cubic crystals in limestone at Vogtsburg in the Kaiserstuhl, a mountainous district of Baden.

dysarthria (dis-âr-thri-â), n. [NL., < Gr. δύσ-, hard, + ἄρθρον, a joint.] In pathol., inability to articulate distinctly; dyslalia.

dysarthric (dis-âr-thrik), a. [cf. dysarthria + -ic.] Of or pertaining to dysarthria.

Dyster (dis-as'ter), n. [NL., < Gr. δύσ-, bad, + αστήρ = E. star.] A genus of fossil petalostichous sea-urchins, of the family Cassidulidæ or Collyritidæ, or giving name to a family Dysteridæ.

Dysteridæ (dis-as-ter'i-dæ), n. pl. [NL., < Dyster + -idæ.] A family of irregular or exocyclic sea-urchins, typified by the genus Dyster, with ovoid or cordate shell, showing bivium and trivium converging to separate apices, non-petaloid ambulacra, and eccentric mouth.

dyschezia (dis-kê-zî-â), n. [NL., < Gr. δύσ-, hard, + ἔχειν, defecate.] In pathol., difficulty and pain in defecation.

dyschroia, dyschroa (dis-kroi'â, dis'krô-â), n. [NL., < Gr. δύσ-, bad, + χρῶμα, Attic also χρῶς, color.] In pathol., discoloration of the skin from disease.

dyschromatopsia (dis-krô-ma-top'si-â), n. [NL., < Gr. δύσ-, bad, + χρῶμα (-r), color, + ὥψις, view, sight.] In pathol., feeble or perverted color-sense. Also dyschromatopathy, dischromatopsia.

dysclaseite (dis'klâ-sit), n. [cf. Gr. δύσ-, hard, + κλάω, a breaking (< κλῆω, break), + -ite2.] In mineral., a mineral, usually fibrous, of a white or yellowish color and somewhat pearly luster, consisting chiefly of hydrous silicate of lime. Also called okenite.

dyscophid (dis'kô-fid), n. A toad-like amphibian of the family Dyscophidæ.

Dyscophidæ (dis-kô-fî-dæ), n. pl. [NL., < Dyscophus + -idæ.] A family of firmisternal salient anurous amphibians, typified by the genus Dyscophus, with teeth in the upper jaw, dilated sacral diapophyses, precoracoids resting upon coracoids, a cartilaginous omosternum, and a very large anchor-shaped cartilaginous sternum. There are several genera, chiefly Madagascan. Some of these frogs are remarkable for the beauty of their coloration.

Dyscophus (dis-kô'fus), n. [NL., < Gr. δύσ-, stone-deaf, < δύσ-, hard, + κωφός, deaf.] 1. A genus of tailless amphibians, typical of the family Dyscophidæ.—2. In entom.: (a) A genus of the orthopterous family Æcanthidæ, having the front deflexed and the male elytra rudimentary, typified by D. saltator of Brazil. Saussure, 1874. (b) A genus of South American Lepidoptera. Burmeister, 1879.

dyscrase (dis'krās), n. [Formerly also discrase; < NL. dyscrasia: see dyscrasia.] Same as dyscrasia.

dyscrasia (dis-krā'si-â), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσκρασία, bad temperament, < δυσκρατός, of bad temperament, < δύσ-, bad, + κρατός*, verbal adj. of κραννύω, mix (> κράω, mixture): see crater, crasis.] In pathol., a generally faulty condition of the body; morbid diathesis; distemper. Also dyscrase, dyscrasy, and formerly discrase, discrasy.

dyscrasic (dis-kras'ik), a. [cf. dyscrasia + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of dyscrasia; characterized by dyscrasia: as, dyscrasic degeneration.

It should not be forgotten that the death-rate was greater among dyscrasic children. N. Y. Med. Jour., XL. 645.

dyscrasite (dis'krā-sit), n. [cf. Gr. δύσ-, bad, + κράσις, a mixture (see dyscrasia), + -ite2.] A mineral of a silver-white color and metallic luster, occurring in crystals, and also massive and granular. It consists of antimony and silver. Also written discrase, discrasite, and also called antimonial silver (which see, under silver).

dyscrasy (dis'krā-si), n.; pl. dyscrasies (-siz). [Formerly also discrasy; < F. dyscrasie, < NL. dyscrasia: see dyscrasia.] Same as dyscrasia.

Sin is a cause of dyscrasies and distempers, making our bodies healthless. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 256.

A general malaise or dyscrasy, of an undefined character, but indicated by a loss of appetite and of strength, by diarrhoea, nervous prostration, or by a general impairment of health. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 6.

Dysdera (dis'dê-râ), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1804), < Gr. δυσδέρης, hard to fight with, < δύσ-, hard, + δέρω, fight.] The typical genus of spiders of the family Dysderidæ.

Dysderidæ (dis-der'i-dæ), n. pl. [NL., < Dysdera + -idæ.] A family of tubitularian spiders, typified by the genus Dysdera. They are especially distinguished by having two pairs of stigmata, one just behind the other, and distributed on each side of the belly near its base; they have but six eyes or fewer. Also called Dysderides and Dysderidae.

dysenteric, dysenterical (dis-en-ter'ik, i-kal), a. [= F. dysentérique, dysentérique = Sp. disentérico = Pg. dysenterico = It. dysenterico, dysenterico, < L. dysentericus, < Gr. δυσεντερικός, < δυσεντερία, dysentery: see dysentery.] 1. Pertaining to, of the nature of, accompanied by, or resulting from dysentery: as, dysenteric symptoms or effects.—2. Suffering from dysentery: as, a dysenteric patient.

dysenterious (dis-en-tê-ri-us), a. [cf. dysentery + -ous.] Same as dysenteric. [Rare.]

All will be but as delicate meats dressed for a dysenteric person, that can relish nothing. Gataker.

dysentery (dis'en-ter-i), n. [Formerly dysenterie; < F. dysenterie, dysenterie = Sp. dysenteria = Pg. dysenteria = It. dysenteria, dysenteria = D. dysenteria = G. dysenterie = Dan. Sw. dysenteri, < L. dysenteria, < Gr. δυσεντερία, dysentery, < δυσεντερος, suffering in the bowels, < δύσ-, bad, ill, + εντερος, pl. εντερα, the bowels: see entero.] A disease characterized by inflammation of the mucous membrane of the large intestine, mucous, bloody, and difficult evacuations, and more or less fever.

dysepulotic (dis-ep-û-lot'ik), a. [cf. Gr. δύσ-, hard, + επυλωτικός, q. v.] In surg., not healing or cicatrizing readily or easily: as, a dysepulotic wound.

dysesthesia, dysæsthetic. See dysæsthesia, dysæsthetic.

dysgenesis (dis-jê-nê-s'ik), a. [cf. dysgenesis + -ic.] Breeding with difficulty; sterile; infecund; barren. Darwin.

dysgenesis (dis-jên'e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. δύσ-, hard, + γένεσις, generation.] Difficulty in breeding; difficult generation; sterility; infecundity.

Dysidea (di-sid'ê-â), n. [NL., < Gr. δύσ-, bad, < ἰδέα, form: see idea.] A genus of sponges, typical of the family Dysideidæ. Also Dysideida.

Dysideidae (dis-i-dē-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dysidea + -idae.] A family of fibrous sponges.

dysidrosis (dis-i-drō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσ-, hard, + ιδρώς, sweat, perspiration, < ιδρῶς (√σφδ) = E. sweat.] A disease of the sweat-follicles, in which they become distended with the retained secretion.

dysis (dī'sis), n. [ML., also disis, < Gr. δύσις, setting of the sun or stars (δύσις ἡλίου, the west), < δύειν, sink, dive, set.] In astrol., the seventh house of the heavens, which relates to love, litigation, etc.

dyskinesia (dis-ki-nē'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσκίνησις, < δύς, hard, + κίνησις, movement, < κινεῖν, move.] In pathol., impaired power of voluntary movement.

dyslalia (dis-lā'li-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δύς, hard, + ἁλῆειν, speak.] In pathol., difficulty of utterance dependent on malformation or imperfect innervation of the tongue and other organs of articulation; slow or difficult speech.

dyslexia (dis-lek'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δύς, hard, + λέξις, a speaking, speech, word: see lexicon.] See the extract.

Dr. R. Berlin . . . describes under the name dyslexia a novel psychic affection related to "alexia," or word-blindness, but differing from it in that the patients can read a few lines, but apparently get no sense from their reading and give it up in despair.

Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 648.

dyslogistic (dis-lō-jis'tik), a. [< dyslogy + -istic (after eulogistic, < eulogy). Cf. Gr. δυσλόγητος, hard to compute, also ill-calculating, misguided.] Conveying censure, disapproval, or opprobrium; censorious; opprobrious.

Ask Rens for the motive which gave birth to the prosecution on the part of Actor: the motive of course is the most odious that can be found: desire of gain, if it be a case which opens a door to gain; if not, enmity, though not under that neutral and unpassioned, but under the name of revenge or malice, or some other such dyslogistic name.

Bentham, Judicial Evidence, I. 8.

Any respectable scholar, even if dyslogistic were new to him, would see at a glance that dyslogistic must be a mistake for it, and that the right word must be the reverse of eulogistic. The paternity of dyslogistic—no bantling, but now almost a centenarian—is adjudged to that genius of common-sense, Jeremy Bentham.

F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 309.

Gossips came to mean intimate friends; next, gossip meant the light, familiar talk of such friends; and, finally, with a dyslogistic connotation, any frivolous conversation.

W. E. Hearn, Aryan Household, p. 291.

dyslogistically (dis-lō-jis'ti-kal-i), adv. In a dyslogistic manner; so as to convey censure or disapproval.

Accordingly he [Kant] is set down as a "Transcendentalist," and all the loose connotation of that term, as it is now dyslogistically employed among us, is thought to be applicable to him.

T. H. Green, in Academy.

dyslogy (dis'loj-i), n. [< Gr. δύς, bad, ill, + λογία, < λέγειν, speak; after Gr. εὐλογία, E. eulogy, of opposite meaning.] Dispraise: the opposite of eulogy.

In the way of eulogy and dyslogy and summing-up of character there may doubtless be a great many things set forth concerning this Mirabeau.

Carlyle, Misc., IV. 117.

dysluite (dis'lō-i), n. [< Gr. δύς, hard, + λυεῖν, loosen, + -ite.] A name given to a variety of garnet, or zinc-spinel, from Sussex county, New Jersey, containing a small percentage of manganese: so named because difficult to dissolve.

dysmenorrhea, dysmenorrhœa (dis-men-ō-rē'ā), n. [NL. dysmenorrhœa, < Gr. δύς, hard, + μήν, a month, + ρῆμα, a flowing.] In pathol., difficult or laborious menstruation; catamenial discharges accompanied with much local pain, especially in the loins.

dysmenorrhœal, dysmenorrhœal (dis-men-ō-rē'al), a. [< dysmenorrhœa, dysmenorrhœa, + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or connected with dysmenorrhœa: as, the dysmenorrhœal membrane which is sometimes discharged from the uterus.

dysmerism (dis'me-rizm), n. [< Gr. δύς, bad, + μέρος, part (division), + -ism.] An aggregation of unlike parts; a process or result of dysmerogenesis; a kind of merism opposed to eumerism.

dysmeristic (dis-me-ris'tik), a. [As dysmerism + -istic.] Having the character or quality of dysmerism; irregularly repeated in a set of more or less unlike parts whose relations to one another, or origin one from another, is disguised; dysmerogenetic: opposed to eumeristic. See extract under dysmerogenesis.

dysmerogenesis (dis'me-rō-jen'e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. δύς, bad, + μέρος, part (division), + γένεσις, generation.] The genesis, origination, or production of many unlike parts, or of parts in irregular series or at irregular times, which together form an integral whole; dysmeristic generation; repetition of forms with adaptive modification or functional specialization; a kind of merogenesis opposed to eumerogenesis.

The tendency to bud formation . . . has all along acted concurrently with a powerful synthetic tendency, so that new units have from the first made but a gradual and disguised appearance. This is dysmerogenesis, and such aggregates as exhibit it may be called dysmeristic.

Encyc. Brit., XII. 555.

dysmerogenetic (dis'me-rō-jē-net'ik), a. [< dysmerogenesis, after genetic.] Produced by or resulting from dysmerogenesis; characterized by or exhibiting dysmerism; dysmeristic: opposed to eumerogenetic.

dysmeromorph (dis'me-rō-mōrf), n. [< Gr. δύς, bad, + μέρος, part (see dysmerism), + μορφή, shape.] An organic form resulting from dysmerogenesis; a dysmeristic organism: opposed to eumeromorph.

Synthesized eumeromorph simulates normal dysmeromorph; analyzed dysmeromorph simulates normal eumeromorph.

Encyc. Brit., XII. 555.

dysmeromorphic (dis'me-rō-mōrf'ik), a. [< dysmeromorph + -ic.] Having the character or quality of a dysmeromorph; dysmerogenetic or dysmeristic in form: opposed to eumeromorph.

dysnomy (dis'nō-mi), n. [< Gr. δυσνομία, lawlessness, a bad constitution, < δύσνομος, lawless, < δύς, bad, + νόμος, law.] Bad legislation; the enactment of bad laws.

dysodile (dis'ō-dil), n. [< Gr. δυσώδης, ill-smelling (< δύς, ill, + ὀσμεῖν, smell, akin to L. odor, smell), + -ile.] A kind of greenish- or yellowish-gray coal occurring in masses made up of foliaceous layers, which when burning emits a very fetid odor. It is a product of the decomposition of combined vegetable and animal matters. It was first observed at Melilli in Sicily, and has also been found at several places in Germany and France.

dysodont (dis'ō-dont), a. [< NL. dysodont (t)-s, < Gr. δύς, bad, + ὀδών (δόντ-) = E. tooth.] In conch., having obsolete or irregular hinge-teeth; specifically, of or pertaining to the Dysodonta.

Dysodonta (dis-ō-dont'ā), n. pl. [NL. pl. of dysodont: see dysodont.] A group or order of bivalve mollusks having obsolete or irregular hinge-teeth, muscular impressions unequal or reduced to one, and pallial line entire. It corresponds to the Monomyaria.

Dysodus (dis'ō-dus), n. [NL., irreg., < Gr. δύς, bad, + ὀδών = E. tooth.] A generic name bestowed by Cope upon the Japanese pug-dog, called Dysodus pravus, characterized by such degradation of the dentition that there may be in all but 16 teeth (no incisors, 1 canine in each half-jaw, 1 premolar and 1 molar in each upper, and 2 premolars and 2 molars in each lower half-jaw), thus exemplifying actual evolution of a generic form by "artificial selection" of comparatively few years' duration.

dysodotia (dis-ō-tō'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δύς, ill, + ωτοκία, a laying of eggs, < ωτόκος, laying eggs, < ὄν (= L. ovum), egg, + τίκτεν, τέκνιν, produce, bear.] In zool., difficult ovulation.

dysopia (dis-ō'pi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσωρία, confusion of face (taken in the def. in another sense), < δύς, bad, ill, + ὤψ (ὤπ-), eye, face.] Same as dysopsia.

dysopsia (dis-op'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δύς, bad, + ὤψ, view, sight.] In pathol., painful or defective vision.

dysopsy (dis-op'si), n. [< Gr. δύς, bad, ill, + ὤψ, sight.] Same as dysopsia.

dysorexia (dis-ō-rek'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσωρεξία, feebleness of appetite, < δύς, bad, + ὀρεξις, appetite.] In pathol., a depraved or failing appetite.

dysorexy (dis-ō-rek-si), n. Same as dysorexia.

dyspareunia (dis-pa-rō'ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δύς, hard, + παρεῖναι, lying beside, < παρά, beside, + εἶναι, bed.] In pathol., inability to perform the sexual act without pain: usually applied to females.

dyspepsia (dis-pep'si-ā), n. [Also dyspepsy; = F. dyspepsie = Sp. It. dyspepsia = Pg. dyspepsia, < L. dyspepsia, < Gr. δυσπεψία, indigestion, < δύσπεπτος, hard to digest, < δύς, hard, + πέπτος, verbal adj. of πέπεω, ripen, soften, cook, digest, = L. coquere, cook: see cook.] Impaired power of digestion. The term is applied with a certain freedom to all forms of gastric derangement, whether involving impaired power of digestion or not. But it is usually discarded when some more definite diagnosis can be made.

as gastric cancer, gastric ulcer, gastritis, gastrectasia, or when it depends on poisonous ingesta or appears as a feature of some other disease, especially if that is acute. Functional dyspepsia, also called atonic and nervous dyspepsia, is gastric derangement, not exclusively neuralgic, which may involve a diminished or an excessive secretion of the gastric juice, or diminished or excessive acidity in that secretion, or an irritability of the stomach-walls or an impairment of their motor functions, and which appears to depend on some defect in the innervation of the stomach, and not on some grosser lesion.

dyspepsy (dis-pep'si), n. Same as dyspepsia. dyspeptic (dis-pep'tik), a. and n. [= F. dyspeptique, < Gr. as if δυσπεπτικός, < δυσπεψία, dyspepsia: see dyspepsia.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of dyspepsia: as, a dyspeptic complaint.—2. Suffering from or afflicted with dyspepsia or indigestion: as, a dyspeptic person.—3. Characteristic of one afflicted with chronic dyspepsia; hence, bilious; morbid; "blue"; pessimistic; misanthropic: as, a dyspeptic view or opinion.

II. n. A person afflicted with dyspepsia.
dyspeptical (dis-pep'ti-kal), a. [< dyspeptic + -al.] Troubled with dyspepsia; hence, inclined to morbid or pessimistic views of things.

How seldom will the outward capability fit the inward; though talented wonderfully enough, we are poor, unfriended, dyspeptical, bashful; nay, what is worse than all, we are foolish.

Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, p. 83.

dysphagia (dis-fā'ji-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. as if δυσφαγία*, < δύς, hard, + φαγεῖν, eat.] In pathol., difficulty in swallowing. Also dysphagy.

dysphagic (dis-fāj'ik), a. Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with dysphagia.

dysphagy (dis-fā-ji), n. [= F. dysphagie; < NL. dysphagia: see dysphagia.] Same as dysphagia.

dysphonia (dis-fō'ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσφωνία, roughness of sound, < δύσφωνος, ill-sounding, < δύς, ill, + φωνή, sound.] In pathol., difficulty in producing vocal sounds.

dysphony (dis-fō'ni), n. [= F. dysphonie; < NL. dysphonia: see dysphonia.] Same as dysphonia.

dysphoria (dis-fō'ri-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσφορία, pain hard to be borne, anguish, < δύσφορος, hard to bear, < δύς, hard, + φόρος, < φέρω = E. bear.] In pathol., impatience under affliction; a state of dissatisfaction, restlessness, fidgeting, or inquietude.

dysphuistic (dis-fū-is'tik), a. [< dys, bad, + -phuistic as in euphuistic, q. v.] Ill-sounding; inelegant.

Of A Lover's Complaint . . . I have only space or need to remark that it contains two of the most exquisitely Shakespearean verses ever vouchsafed to us by Shakespeare, and two of the most exuberantly euphuistic or dysphuistic lines ever inflicted on us by him.

Swinburne, Shakespeare, p. 62.

dyspnœa (disp-nē'ā), n. [L., < Gr. δύσπνοια, difficulty of breathing, < δύσπνως, scant of breath, short-breathed, < δύς, hard, + πνέω; cf. πνέω, breathing, < πνέω, breathe.] In pathol., difficulty of breathing; difficult or labored respiration.

dyspnœal (disp-nē'al), a. [< dyspnœa + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of dyspnœa; connected with dyspnœa.

dyspnœic (disp-nē'ik), a. [< L. dyspnoicus, n., one short of breath, < Gr. δύσπνοικός, short of breath, < δύσπνοια, dyspnœa: see dyspnœa.] Affected with or resulting from dyspnœa; dyspnœal.

dysporomorph (dis'pō-rō-mōrf), n. One of the Dysporomorphæ.

Dysporomorphæ (dis'pō-rō-mōrf'fē), n. pl. [NL., < Dysporus + Gr. μορφή, form.] In Huxley's system of classification (1867), a division of desmognathous birds, exactly corresponding to the Steganopodes, Totipalmati, or oar-footed natatorial birds. They have all four toes webbed, the oil-gland surmounted by a circlet of feathers, the sternum broad and truncate posteriorly, the mandibular angle truncate, the maxillopalatines large and spongy, the united palatines carinate, and no basipterygoid processes. The division includes the pelicans, gannets, cormorants, frigates, darters, and tropic birds.

dysporomorphic (dis'pō-rō-mōrf'ik), a. [< Dysporomorphæ + -ic.] Belonging to or resembling the Dysporomorphæ; totipalmate; steganopodous.

Dysporus (dis'pō-rus), n. [NL. (Illiger, 1811: so called with reference to the closure or obliteration of the nostrils), < Gr. δύσπορος, hard to pass, difficult, < δύς, hard, + πόρος, passage.] A genus of gannets: same as Sula. It is often separated from Sula to designate the brown gannets, as the booby, D. flier, as distinguished from the white ones, as S. bassana.

dysssycus (di-si'kus), n.; pl. dysssyci (-si). [NL., < Gr. δύς, bad, + σύνκω, a fig.] Haeckel's name for a form of sponge also called rhagon.

dysteleological (dis-tel'e-ō-lōj'i-kal), a. [< dysteleology + -ical.] Purposeless; without design; having no "final cause" for being; not teleological.

dysteleologist (dis-tel-ē-ol'ō-jist), n. [< dys-teleology + -ist.] One who believes in dysteleology.

Dysteleologists, without admitting a purpose, had not felt called upon to deny the fact.

L. F. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., I. 173.

dysteleology (dis-tel-ē-ol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. δυσ-, bad, + τέλος (telos), end, purpose, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see teleology.] The science of rudimentary or vestigial organs, apparently functionless or of no use or purpose in the economy of the organism, with reference to the doctrine of purposelessness. The idea is that many useless or even hurtful parts may be present in an organism in obedience to the law of heredity simply, and that such are evidences of the lack of design or purpose or "final cause" which the doctrines of teleology presume.

The Doctrine of Purposelessness, or Dysteleology.

Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), I. 100.

It is no wonder that Mr. Romanes should avow his "total inability to understand why the phenomena of instinct should be more fatal to the doctrine of Dysteleology than any other of the phenomena of nature."

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 63.

Dysteria (dis-tē'ri-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσ-, hard, + τρεῖν, watch, have an eye on, keep; cf. δακρυπνός, hard to keep.] The typical genus of Dysteriidae. D. armata of Huxley, which inhabits salt water, has such a structure that it has been supposed by Gosse to be a rotifer.

Dysteriidae (dis-tē'ri-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dysteria + -idae.] A family of free-swimming animalcules, more or less ovate, cylindrical, flattened or compressed, and mostly encircled. They have the carapace simple or consisting of two lateral, subequal, conjoined, or detached valves; cilia confined to the more or less narrow or constricted ventral surface; the oral aperture followed by a distinct pharynx, the walls of which are strengthened by a simple horny tube, by a cylindrical fascicle of corneous rods, or by otherwise differentiated corneous elements; a conspicuous tail-like style, or compact fascicle of setose cilia presenting a style-like aspect, projecting from the posterior extremity. Most of them inhabit salt water.

Dysterina (dis-tē'ri-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Dysteria + -ina.] A family of ciliate infusorians, typified by the genus Dysteria. Claparède and Lachmann, 1858-60. See Dysteriidae.

dysthesia (dis-thē'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δυσθεσία, a bad condition, < δυσθερός, in bad condition: see dysthetic.] In pathol., a non-febrile morbid state of the blood-vessels; a bad habit of body dependent mainly upon the state of the circulating system.

dysthetic (dis-thet'ik), a. [< Gr. δυσθερός, in bad case, in bad condition, < δυσ-, bad, + θερός, verbal adj. of τρεῖν-va, put, place.] Of, pertaining to, or characterized by dysthesia.

dysthymic (dis-thim'ik), a. [< Gr. δυσθυμικός, melancholy, < δυσθυμία, despondency, despair, < δυσ-, bad, + θυμός, spirit, courage.] In pa- thol., affected with despondency; depressed in spirits; dejected.

dystocia (dis-tō'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. δυστοκία, a painful delivery, < δυστοκος, bringing forth with pain, < δυσ-, hard, + τίκτω, τεκνῶ, bring forth.] In pathol., difficult parturition. Also dystokia.

dystome (dis'tōm), a. Same as dystomic.

dystomic, dystomous (dis-tōm'ik, dis'tō-mus), a. [< Gr. δυστομος, hard to cut (but taken in pass. sense 'badly cleft'), < δυσ-, hard, bad, + τομή, verbal adj. of τέμνειν, cut.] In mineral., having an imperfect fracture or cleavage.

dystrophic (dis-trof'ik), a. [< dystrophy + -ic.] Pertaining to a perversion of nutrition.

dystrophy (dis-trō'fi), n. [< Gr. δυσ-, hard, ill, + τροφή, nourishment, < τρέφειν, nourish.] In pathol., perverted nutrition.

dysuria (dis-ū'ri-ā), n. [LL., < Gr. δυσουρία, < δυσ-, hard, + οὖρον, urine.] In pathol., difficulty in micturition, attended with pain and scalding. Also dysury.

dysuric (dis-ū'rik), a. [< dysuria + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of dysuria; affected with dysuria.

dysury (dis-ū'ri), n. Same as dysuria.

Dytes (di'tēz), n. [NL. (Kaup, 1829), < Gr. δύτης, a diver, < δύειν, dive.] A genus of small grebes, of the family Podicipedidae, containing such species as the horned and the eared grebe.

Dytiscidae, n. pl. See Dytiscidae.

Dytiscus, n. See Dytiscus.

dytiscid (di-tis'id), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Dytiscidae.

II. n. A water-beetle of the family Dytiscidae.

Dytiscidae, Dyticidae (di-tis'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Dytiscus, Dyticus, + -idae.] A family of two-eyed aquatic adephagous Coleoptera, or predatory beetles, having the metasternum destitute of an antecoxal piece, but prolonged in a triangular process posteriorly, the antennæ slender, filiform, or setaceous, and the abdomen with six segments. The Dytiscidae are related to the ground-beetles or Carabidae, but differ in the form of the metasternum, and in the structure of the legs, which are natatorial. They are water-beetles, mostly of large size, with narrowly oval depressed bodies and oar-like hind legs, found almost everywhere in fresh water.

Dytiscus, Dyticus (di-tis'kus, dit'i-kus), n. [NL., orig. and commonly Dytiscus (Linnaeus), Dyticus (Geoffroy, 1764), < Gr. δύτικός, able to dive, < δύειν, a diver, < δύειν, dive, sink, get into, enter.] The typical genus of predaceous water-beetles of the family Dytiscidae, having the metasternal spiracles covered by the elytra, the front tarsi five-jointed, and patellate in the male, and the hind tarsi not ciliate, with the claws equal. The numerous species are large, but difficult to distinguish. They are dark olive-green above, the thorax and elytra being often margined with yellow. The elytra are smooth in the male, usually sulcate in the female. D. macripennis (Linnaeus) is very abundant in Europe, inhabiting, like the other species, large bodies of stagnant water. Some species are called water-butts.

dyvour (di'-vūr), n. [Sc., also dyvor, diver, < F. devoir, a duty, obligation, etc.: see dever and devoir.] In old Scots law, a bankrupt who had made a cessio bonorum to his creditors.

Louis, what reck I by thee,
Or Geordie on his ocean?
Dyvor, beggar loons to me—
I reign in Jeanie's bosom.

Burns.

dzeren, dzeron (dzē'ren, -ron), n. [Mongol. name.] The Chinese antelope, Procapra gutturosa, a remarkably swift animal, inhabiting the arid deserts of central Asia, Tibet, China, and southern Siberia. It is nearly 4½ feet long, and is 2½ feet high at the shoulder. When alarmed it clears over 20 feet at one bound. Also called goitered antelope and yellow goat.

dziggetai (dzig'ge-ti), n. [Mongol. name.] The wild ass of Asia, Equus hemionus, whose habits are graphically recorded in the book of Job, and which is believed to be the hemionus of Herodotus and Pliny. It is intermediate in appearance and character between the horse and the ass (hence the specific name hemionus, half-ass). The males especially are fine animals, standing as high as 14 hands. It lives in small herds, and is an inhabitant of the sandy steppes of central Asia, 16,000 feet above sea-level. The dziggetai or hemionus is one of several closely related species, or more probably varieties, of large wild Asiatic asses which appear to lack the black stripe across the withers. Two of these are sometimes distinguished under the names of kulan (Equus onager), a wide-ranging form, and kiang (E. kiang), of Tibet. See onager, ghur, and khur. Also spelled dyiggetai and in other ways.

From the capital E have come by gradual modification and variation (as in the case of the other letters) all the other printed and written forms. The value of the sign in the Semitic alphabets was and still is that of an aspiration, a peculiar smooth h. But when the alphabet was adapted to Greek use, this unnecessary aspirate-sign was utilized as a sign for a vowel-sound, either short or long, being nearly that instanced in our two words met and they. This double value in point of quantity it had in all early Greek use, and until in one section of the Greek race—and later, after their example, in all the others—it was found convenient to distinguish the long sound by a separate sign, H (see H), after which the E was restricted to denoting the short sound, as in our met. This distinction was not introduced into the Italian alphabets; hence the same sign stands for both short and long sound in Latin, and with us. The name of the sign in Phœnician was he (of doubtful meaning; usually explained as 'window'); in Greek it was ē, and later ἔ υῶς, 'simple e'—it is believed, in antithesis to the double ai, which then had the same sound. In most of the languages of Europe the sign has retained its original Greek and Latin value; in the English it has done this only so far as concerns the short sound; the long sound has, in the history of the changes of pronunciation, so generally passed over into what was originally the long i-sound, that we now call this sound long e (as in met, met, meat, etc.). The proper e-sound (in met, they) is phonetically a medium between the completely open a of father and the close sound i of pique. In its two quantities (met, they) it constitutes about five per cent. of English utterance. Taking into account also the numerous digraphs, as ea, ee, ey, ae, ie, oe, in which it is found, and its frequent occurrence as a silent letter, e is the most used of our alphabetic signs. This frequency is due in considerable measure to the general reduction of the vowels of endings to e that constitutes a conspicuous part of the change from Anglo-Saxon to English. The total loss then, further, of many of these endings in utterance has left numerous cases of silent final e, to which others have been added by analogy with these. A degree of value in the economy of our written speech belongs to it, in so far as its occurrence after a single consonant now almost regularly indicates the long sound of the vowel preceding that consonant, as in mate, mete, mite, mote, mute; but in many cases it appears also after a single consonant preceded by a short vowel, and such cases, as give, live, have, vineyard, constitute one of the classes where reform in orthography is most easily made, and has most to recommend it. (See ea.) E has further come to be used as an orthographic auxiliary, in some cases after e and g, where it is conventionally regarded as preserving the so-called "soft" sound of those letters, as in peaceable, manageable.

2. As a numeral, 250. Du Cange.—3. As a symbol: (a) In the calendar, the fifth of the dominical letters. (b) In logic, the sign of the universal negative proposition. See A, 2 (b). (c) In alg.: (1) [cap.] The operation of enlargement: thus, $Efx = f(x + 1)$; also, the greatest integer as small as the quantity which follows: thus, $E_3 = 3$. (2) [l. c.] The base of the Napierian system of logarithms; also, the eccentricity of a conic.—4. In music: (a) The key-note of the major key of four sharps, having the signature (1), or of the minor key of one sharp, having the signature (2); also, the final of the Phrygian mode in medieval music. (b) In the fixed system of solmization, the third tone of the scale, called mi; hence so named by French musicians. (c) On the keyboard of the pianoforte, the white key to the right of every group of two black keys. (d) The tone given by such a key, or a tone in unison with such a tone. (e) The degree of a staff assigned to such a key or tone; with the treble clef, the lower line and upper space (3). (f) A note on such a degree, indicating such a key or tone (4).—5. As an abbreviation: (a) East: as, E, by S., east by south. See S. E., E. S. E., etc. (b) In various phrase-abbreviations. See e. g., i. e., E. and O. E., etc.—E dur, the key of E major.—E moll, the key of E minor.

e-1. A prefix of Anglo-Saxon origin, one of the forms of the original prefix ge-. It remains unfelt in enough. See i-.

e-2. [L. ē, ē, reduced form of ex-; see ex-.]

A prefix of Latin origin, a reduced form of ex-, alternating with ex- before consonants, as in evade, elude, emit, etc. See ex-. In some scientific terms it denotes negation or privation, like Greek ἀ- privative (being then conventionally called e- privative): as, evade, tailless, anurous; edentate, toothless, etc. In elope the prefix is an accommodated form of Dutch ent-.

e-3. [ME. -e, -en, < AS. -a, -e, -o, -u, -an, -en, etc.]

The unpronounced termination of many English words. Silent final e is of various origin, being the common representative (pronounced in earlier English) of almost all the Anglo-Saxon, Old French, Latin, etc., inflection-endings. In nouns and adjectives of native origin it may be regarded as representing the original vowel-ending of the nominative (as in ale, tale, stake, rake, etc.), or, more generally, the original oblique cases (dative, etc.), which from their greater frequency became in Middle English the accepted form of the nominative also, as in lode, pole, mile, wile, etc.; similarly, in words of Latin and other origin, as rule, rude, spike, sprite, etc. In verbs of native origin -e represents the original infinitive (AS. -an, ME. -en, -e) mixed with the present indicative, etc., as in make, wake, write, etc. In a great number of words the -e has disappeared as an actual sound, the letter being retained, as a result of phonetic and orthographic accident, as a conventional sign of "length"—an accented vowel followed by a single consonant before final silent e being regularly "long," as in rate, vide, rode, tube, etc., words distinguished thus from forms with a "short" vowel, rat, writ, rod, tub, etc. In words of recent introduction -e is used whenever this distinction is to be made. In some cases the vowel preceding -e is short, as in give, live, bade, have, javelin, vineyard, etc., especially in polysyllabic words, -ile, -ine, -ite, etc., as hostile, glycerine, opposite, etc.; but some of these words were formerly, or are now often spelled without the superfluous e, as bad, glycerin, fibrin, deposits, etc. Etymologically, final e in modern English has no weight or value, it being a mere chance whether it represents an original vowel or syllable.

é. [F. -é, fem. -ée, pp. suffix, < L. -ātus, -āta: see -atol-] A French suffix, the termination of perfect participles, and of adjectives and nouns thence derived, some of which are used, though consciously as French words, in English, as protégé, négligé, retroussé, dégagé, écarté, etc. The Anglicized form is -eé (which see).

ea. A common English digraph, introduced about the beginning of the sixteenth century, having then the sound of ā, and serving to distinguish e or ee with that sound from e or ee with the sound of ē. The original sound ā remained in most of the words having ea until the eighteenth century, and still prevails in break, great, yea, and in a dialectal ("Irish") pronunciation of beast, please, mean, etc. (which in dialect-writing are spelled no as to represent this pronunciation: see baste); it has become ē in bread, dread, head, meadow, health, wealch, leather, weather, etc., and, modified by the following r, in beard, bears, heart, hearth, earth, learn, etc. In most words, however, the digraph ea now agrees in sound with ee, namely, ē, as in read, pronounced the same as reed (but the preterit read like red). The modern digraph ea has no connection with the Anglo-Saxon and early Middle English diphthong or "breaking" ea, though it happens to replace it in some words, as in bread (Anglo-Saxon bræd), lead (Anglo-Saxon lēa), earl (Anglo-Saxon eorl).

ea. An abbreviation of each.

each (ēch), a. and pron. [(1) ME. ech, echo, æche, iche, yche, uche, etc., these being prop. oblique forms, assimilated, of the proper nom. elc, elc, eilo, ilk, ylc, ulo (> So. ilk, ilka), each, < AS. elc (= MD. iegelick, ellick, elck, D. elk = OFries. elc, ellick, ek, ik = *MLG. Shak., Hen. VIII., iii. 2.

To the holy war how fast and eagerly did men go!

South, Sermons.

eagerness (ē'gēr-nes), n. 1†. Tartness; sourness; sharpness.—2. Keen or vehement desire in the pursuit or for the attainment of something, or a manifestation of such desire; ardent tendency; zeal; fervor: as, to pursue happiness or wealth with eagerness; eagerness of manner or speech.

She knew her distance, and did angle for me, Madding my eagerness with her restraint.

Shak., All's Well, v. 3.

The eagerness and strong bent of the mind after knowledge, if not warily regulated, is often an hinderance to it.

Locke.

What we call our despair is often only the painful eagerness of unfulfilled hope.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, ii. 81.

=Syn. 2. Earnestness, Avidity, Eagerness, Zeal, Enthusiasm, ardor, vehemence, impetuosity, heartiness, longing, impatience. The first five words may all denote strong and worthy movements of feeling and purpose toward a desired object. In this field eagerness has either a physical or a moral application; with avidity the physical application is primary; earnestness, zeal, and enthusiasm have only the moral sense. Avidity represents a desire for food, primarily physical, figuratively mental: as, to read a new novel with avidity; it rarely goes beyond that degree of extension. Eagerness emphasizes an intense desire, generally for specific things, although it may stand also as a trait of character; it tends to produce corresponding keenness in the pursuit of its object. Earnestness denotes a more sober feeling, proceeding from reason, conviction of duty, or the less violent emotions, but likely to prove stronger and more permanent than any of the others. The word has at times a special reference to effort; it implies solidity, sincerity, energy, and conviction of the laudableness of the object sought; it is contrasted with eagerness in that it affects the whole character. Zeal is by derivation a bubbling up with heat; it is naturally, therefore, an active quality, passionate and yet generally sustained, an abiding ardor or fervent devotion in any unselfish cause. Enthusiasm is so far redeemed from its early suggestion of extravagance that it denotes presumably a trait of character more general than eagerness or zeal, more lively than earnestness, a lofty quickness of feeling and purpose in the pursuit of laudable things under the guidance of reason and conscience; thus it differs from zeal, which still generally implies a poorly balanced judgment.

The nobles in great earnestness are going

All to the senate-house. Shak., Cor., iv. 6.

I lent her some modern works: all these she read with avidity.

Charlotte Brontë, The Professor, xviii.

So Gawain, looking at the villainy done,

Forbore, but in his heat and eagerness

Trembled and quivered.

Tennyson, Pelleas and Ettarre.

It was the sense that the cause of education was the cause of religion itself that inspired Ælfred and Dunstan alike with their zeal for teaching.

J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 325.

Truth is never to be expected from authors whose understandings are warped with enthusiasm; for they judge all actions, and their causes, by their own perverse principles, and a crooked line can never be the measure of a straight one.

Dryden, Ded. of Plutarch's Lives.

There is a certain enthusiasm in liberty, that makes human nature rise above itself in acts of bravery and heroism.

A. Hamilton, Works, II. 116.

eagle (ē'gl), n. [Early mod. E. also egle; < ME. egle, < OF. egle, aigle, F. aigle = Fr. aigle = Sp. águila = Pg. águila = It. aquila, < L. aquila, an eagle (prob. so called from its dark-brown color), fem. of aquilus, dark-colored, brown (cf. Lith. aklas, blind): see Aquila, aquiline, etc. The native E. name is earn: see earn.] 1. Properly, a very large diurnal raptorial bird of the family Falconidae and genus Aquila (which see), having the feet feathered to the toes, and no tooth to the bill, which is straight for the length of the cere. There are about 9 species, all confined to the old world except the golden eagle, Aquila chrysaetos, which ranges also in North America. This is the type-species, to which the term originally attached; it is 5 feet or more in length, of a dark-brown color, deriving the epithet golden from the ruddy-brown feathers of the back of the neck. It preys on lambs, hares, rabbits, various birds, such as grouse, and carrion. Other notable species are the imperial eagle, A. heliaca; the Russian eagle, A. nobiliss; the spotted eagle, A. maculata (or nauya). From its size, strength, rapacity, and powers of flight and vision, the eagle has been called the king of birds; but its prowess is greatly exaggerated. By the ancients it was called the bird of Jove, and it was borne on the Roman standards. Many nations, as France under the Bonapartes, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, have adopted it as the national emblem. In heraldry it ranks as one of the most noble bearings in coat-armour.

There myghte men the ryal egle fynde,

That with his sharpe lok persith the sunne;

And othere eglis of a lowere kynde,

Of whiche that clerik wel devyse kunne.

Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 330.

So the struck eagle, stretched upon the plain, No more through rolling clouds to soar again, View'd his own feather on the fatal dart, And wing'd the shaft that quiver'd in his heart.

Byron, English Bards and Scotch Reviewers, l. 828.

2. A member of the genus Haliaeetus, which comprises the fishing-eagles, sea-eagles, or earns, resembling the eagle proper in size and form, but having the shank bare of feathers and scaly: such as the white- or bald-headed eagle, or bald eagle, H. leucocephalus, the national emblem of the United States; the white-tailed eagle, H. albicilla; the pelagic eagle, H. pelagicus, etc.—3. A name of many raptorial birds larger than the hawk and the buzzard, only distantly related, as the harpy eagle, booted eagle, etc. A number of genera of such large hawks are sometimes grouped with the true eagles in a subfamily Aquilina (which see).

4. [cap.] An ancient northern constellation between Cygnus and Sagittarius, containing the bright star Altair. It seems to be shown on Babylonian stones of high antiquity, and the statement still current that it almost touches the equinoctial refers to the position of that circle about 2000 B. C. At present the constellation, enlarged by the addition of Antinous shortly after the Christian era, extends 20° north and 13° south of the equator. See Aquila, 2.

5. A military ensign or standard surmounted by the figure of an eagle. It is especially associated with ancient Rome, though borne, with various modifications, by certain modern nations, as France under the first and second empires.

This utter'd, overboard he leaps, and with his Eagle feircly advanc'd runs upon the Enemy.

Milton, Hist. Eng., ii.

What! shall a Roman sink in soft repose,

And tamely see the Britons aid his foes?

See then secure the rebel Gaul supply;

Spurn his vain eagles and his power defy?

Langhorne, Caesar's Dream.

6. A lectern, usually of wood or brass, the upper part of which is in the shape of an eagle with outstretched wings supporting a book-rest, the eagle being the symbol of Saint John the Evangelist.

[The minister] read from the eagle. Thackeray.

7. A gold coin of the United States, of the value of 10 dollars, weighing 258 grains troy, 900 fine, and equivalent to £2 1s. 1d. sterling.

—8. In arch., a name for a pedestal.—9. In the game of roulette, a spot, outside the regular 36 numbers, upon which is the picture of an eagle. If this is the winning number, the bank takes in all bets except those made on that particular one. See roulette. Also called eagle-bird.—American eagle. See bald eagle.—Bald eagle, or bald earn, a common though misapplied name for the white-headed eagle of North America, Haliaeetus leucocephalus. This is the eagle which has been adopted as the national emblem on the arms of the United States, and is figured on some of its coins, being popularly called "the American eagle," "the spread eagle," "the national bird," "the bird of freedom," etc. It is about 3 feet long, dark-brown or blackish when adult, with pure-white head and tail; the shank is partly naked and yellow, by which mark the species may be distinguished in any plumage from the golden eagle, Aquila chrysaetos. Also called white- or bald-headed eagle. See cut on following page.—Black eagle. (a) The golden eagle, Aquila chrysaetos. (b) The young of the bald eagle, Haliaeetus leucocephalus.—Calumet eagle. See calumet.—Fishing-eagle. Same as osprey.—Golden eagle. See def. 1.—Order of the Black Eagle, a Prussian order founded by Frederick I. in 1701. The number of knights is limited to 30, exclusive of the princes of the blood royal, and all must be of unquestioned nobility. The badge is a cross of 8 points, having in the center a circle with the monogram FE (for Fredericus Rex); the four arms are enameled red, with the eagle of Prussia in black enamel between each two arms. The ribbon is orange, but on occasions of ceremony the badge is worn pendent to a collar, consisting alternately of black eagles holding thunderbolts, and medallions bearing the same monogram as the badge and also the monogram "Suum cuique."—Order of the Red Eagle (formerly Order of the Red Eagle of Bayreuth; also called Order of Sincerity), an order founded by the Margrave of Bayreuth in 1706, and in 1792 adopted by Frederick William II. of Prussia on succeeding to the principality. The present insignia of the order are quite different from those of the original order. The badge is an 8-pointed cross, having in the center a medallion with a red eagle bearing the arms of the Hohenzollern family. The arms of the cross are of white enamel, with an eagle of red enamel between each two arms. The ribbon is striped orange-color and white.—Order of the White Eagle, an order founded at the beginning of the eighteenth century by Augustus II. of Poland and Saxony, or, as is alleged, revived by him. It has been adopted by the Czar of Russia, and is composed of one class only. The badge is a cross of 8 points, bearing a white eagle in relief, and surmounted by an imperial crown. The ribbon is sky-blue, but on state occasions the badge is worn pendent to a collar of white eagles connected by plain gold links.—Spread eagle, an eagle with outspread wings; specifically, the emblem of the United States of America: often applied attributively to any loud, bombastic, boastful, and arrogant display of national or other sentiments: as, a spread-eagle speech. See spread-eaglesm.

Bald Eagle (Haliaeetus leucocephalus).

eagle-bird (ē'gl-bērd), n. Same as eagle, 9.
eagle-eyed (ē'gl-id), a. 1. Sharp-sighted, like an eagle.—2. Quick to discern; having acute intellectual vision.

I know the frailty of my fleshly will:
My passion's eagle-eyed. Quarles, Emblems, iv. 1.
To be curious and Eagle-eyed Abroad, and to be Blind and ignorant at Home, . . . is a Curiosity that carrieth with it more of Affectation than any thing else.
Howell, Letters, ii. 55.

eagle-fish, n. [ME. egrefyn (see quot.), < F. dial. (Champagne) aigrefin, also pron. aiglefin (as if connected with aigle, > E. eagle), a sort of fish; origin uncertain.] An alleged old name of the haddock.

Belonius states that Egrefin or Eagle-fish was formerly its [the haddock's] English name. Day.

eagle-fighted (ē'gl-fī'ted), a. Flying like an eagle; mounting high. [Poetical.]

eagle-hawk (ē'gl-hāk), n. A hawk of the genus Morphnus, as the Guiana eagle-hawk, M. guianensis. G. Cuvier.

eagle-owl (ē'gl-oul), n. 1. A name of the great horned owl of Europe, Bubo maximus, and hence of other large species of the same genus, as B. virginianus, the great horned owl of North America. See cut under Bubo.—2. A name of sundry other large owls. Swainson.

eagle-ray (ē'gl-rā), n. 1. A large species of ray, Myliobatis aquila, a batoid fish of the family Myliobatidae, found in the Atlantic. The sides or pectoral fins are expanded in a wing-like form, and the jaws are paved with rows of hexagonal teeth, the median of which are of much greater breadth than length.

2. Any ray of the family Myliobatidae. These rays are immensely broad, owing to the development of the pectoral fins, and have a long, flexible tail, armed with one or more serrated spines. They inhabit for the most part tropical or warm seas.

eagle-sighted (ē'gl-sī'ted), a. Having strong sight, as an eagle.

What peremptory eagle-sighted eye
Dares look upon the heaven of her brow,
That is not blinded by her majesty?

eagless (ē'gles), n. [< eagle + -ess.] A female or hen eagle. Sherwood. [Rare.]

eaglestone (ē'gl-stōn), n. [Tr. of Gr. ἀετίνης; see aëtites.] A variety of argillaceous oxid of iron, found in masses varying from the size of a walnut to that of a man's head. In form these masses are spherical, oval, or nearly reniform, or sometimes resemble a parallelopiped with rounded edges and angles. They have a rough surface, and are essentially composed of concentric layers. The nodules often embrace at the center a kernel or nucleus, sometimes movable, and always differing from the exterior in color, density, and fracture. To these hollow nodules the Greeks gave the name of eaglestones, from a notion that the eagle transported them to her nest to facilitate the laying of her eggs. Also called aëtites.

Whether the aëtites or eaglestone hath that eminent property to promote delivery or restrain abortion, respectively applied to lower or upward parts of the body, we shall not discourage common practice by our question.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 5.

eaglet (ē'glet), n. [Earlier mod. E. also eglet; < F. aiglette, dim. of aigle, eagle: see eagle.] A young eagle; a little eagle. In heraldry, when three or more eagles are borne on an escutcheon they are usually called eaglets, and always so when they are borne upon an ordinary, as a bend, fesse, etc., or another bearing, or on a mantle.

When like an eagle I first found my love,
For that the virtue I thereof would know,
Upon the nest I set it forth, to prove
If it were of that kindly kind, or no. Drayton.
My dark tall pines, that . . .
Foster'd the callow eaglet. Tennyson, Enone.

eagle-vulture (ē'gl-vul'tūr), n. A book-name of the Gypohierax angolensis of western Africa.

eagle-winged (ē'gl-wingd), a. Having the wings of an eagle; swift as an eagle.

The eagle-winged pride
Of sky-aspiring and ambitious thoughts.
Shak., Rich. II., i. 3.

eaglewood (ē'gl-wūd), n. [< eagle + wood; like F. bois d'aigle, G. adlerholz, a translation of NL. lignum aquile, or aquilaria, which is an accom. (to L. aquila, eagle) of the E. Ind. name aghi, Hind. agar, < Skt. agaru or aguru (the latter form accom. to aguru, not heavy, < a-priv. + guru = Gr. βαρύς = L. gravis, heavy), > prob. Gr. αγάλλω, NL. agallochum: see agallochum and Alōē.] A highly fragrant wood, much used by Asiatics for incense. See agallochum.

eagress (ē'grās), n. Same as eddis, 1.

eagre, n. See eager, 2.

ealdt, n. A dialectal variant of eld. Grose.

ealdert, n. An obsolete (Middle English and rare Anglo-Saxon) form of elder, 2.

ealdorman, n. [AS. see alderman.] A chief; a leader: the Anglo-Saxon original of alderman, used in modern historical works with reference to its Anglo-Saxon use.

The name of Ealdorman is one of a large class; among a primitive people age implies command and command implies age; hence, in a somewhat later stage of language, the elders are simply the rulers.

E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, I. 51.

The bishop declared the ecclesiastical law, as the ealdorman did the secular.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 299.

eamt, n. [Formerly eam; < ME. eme, eam, eam, em, < AS. eam, contr. of eahām*, = OFries. em = D. oom, uncle, = OHG. MHG. heim, uncle (mother's brother), also nephew (sister's son), G. heim, ohm, uncle. The first syllable, AS. ea- (= Goth. au-), is perhaps related to Goth. awo, grandmother, Icel. afi, grandfather, ai, great-grandfather, and to L. av-un-culus, uncle, av-us, grandfather; the second syllable is obscure. Eam remains in the surnames Eames and Ames.] Uncle.

Sone to hem of the cite a-ssembled he thanne, & faugt than so ferscheil for his enes sake.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 3426.

Henry Hotspur, and his eame
The earl of Worster.

Drayton, Polyolbion, xxii.

ean (ēn), v. i. [< ME. enen, bring forth young, < AS. eanian, contr. of edcian, be pregnant, < edcen, pregnant, lit. increased, pp. of edcan*, pret. ēbc* (= Icel. auka = Goth. aukan), increase, found only in the pp. ēacen: see eke, Cf. the equiv. yeen, which differs from ean only in the prefix.] To bring forth young; yeen. See yeen.

Both do feed,
As either promised to increase your breed
At eaning-time, and bring you lusty twine.
B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, I. 2.

E. and O. E. An abbreviation of the commercial phrase errors and omissions excepted, frequently appended to statements and accounts when rendered.

eanling (ēn'ling), n. [< ean + dim. -ling. Cf. yeenling.] A lamb just brought forth.

All the eanlings which were streak'd and pied Should fall as Jacob's hire. Shak., M. of V., I. 3.

earl (ēr), n. [Early mod. E. eare; < ME. ere, ire, eare, < AS. ēdre = OS. ōra = OFries. āre, ār = D. oor = MLG. Bulg. Croatian, Serv. ucho = Bohem. Pol. ucho = Russ. ukho = Lith. ausis = OPruss. ausins (pl. acc.), ear; a general Indo-European name, prob. allied to Gr. dieu, hear, perceive, L. audire, hear: see audience, audit, etc., auscultate, etc. Connection with hear doubtful: see hear.] 1. The organ of hearing; the apparatus of audition; the acoustic sense-organ; any mechanism by which an animal receives the impact of sound-waves and perceives them as sound. In man and mammals generally the ear consists of an external ear, which comprises (1) the more or less funnel-shaped pinna and (2) the external auditory meatus; of an middle ear, ear-drum, or tympanum, closed from the external auditory meatus by the tympanic membrane, traversed by a chain of small bones, the auditory ossicles, named malleus, incus, and stapes, and communicating with the pharynx by the Eustachian tube; and of an internal ear, or labyrinth, the essential organ of hearing, containing the end-organs of the auditory nerve. The labyrinth consists of a complicated closed sac, the membranous labyrinth, lined with epithelium and lying in a roughly corresponding excavation in the petrous bone, the bony labyrinth. The membranous labyrinth contains a limpid fluid, the endolymph, and between the membranous labyrinth and the bony labyrinth is a similar liquid called perilymph. The auditory nerve, penetrating the bone by the internal auditory meatus, is distributed to the walls of the membranous labyrinth. The labyrinth is completely shut off from the tympanum, but there are two fenestrae or openings, closed by membranes, in the tympanic wall of the bony labyrinth, and the foot of the stapes is applied to one of them. Sound-waves which impinge upon the tympanic membrane are transmitted across the tympanum by the chain of auditory ossicles, and thence into the labyrinth. In vertebrates below mammals the ear at once becomes simplified, as by lack of an external ear and reduction of the ossicles and of the labyrinth, the latter being simply ligulate or strap-shaped; and, as in fishes, the inner ear may contain one or more concretions, sometimes of great size, called otoliths or ear-stones. An ear of some kind is recognizable in the great majority of invertebrates. In its simplest recognizable expression it is a mere capsule or vesicle, containing some hard body answering to an otolith, and so supposed to have an auditory function. See cochlea, labyrinth, and cut under tympanic.

External Ear, or Pinna.

1, helix; 2, fossa of antihelix, or fossa triangulæ; 3, fossa of helix, or fossa scaphoideæ; 4, antihelix; 5, s. concha; 6, antitragus; 7, lobule; 8, tragus.

2. The external ear alone, known as the pinna, auricle, or concha: as, the horse laid his ears back.

In another Yle ben folk, that han gret Eres and longe, that hangen down to here Knees.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 205.

Hollowing one hand against his ear,
To list a foot-fall.

Teignyson, Palace of Art.

3. In ornith.: (a) The auriculars or packet of auricular feathers which cover the external ear-passage of a bird. (b) A plumicorn or corniplume; one of the "horns" of an owl.—4. The sense of hearing; the power of distinguishing sounds; the power of nice perception of the differences of sound.

The Poet must know to whose ears he maketh his rime, and accommodate himselfe thereto, not give such musick to the rude and barbarous as he would to the learned and delicate ears.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 72.

5. Specifically, in music, the capacity to appreciate, analyze, and reproduce musical compositions by hearing them; sensitiveness to musical intonation and to differences of pitch and quality in musical sounds: as, a correct ear. Sometimes called a musical ear.

Sneer. I thought you had been a decided critic in music, as well as in literature.

Dangle. So I am—but I have a bad ear.

Sheridan, The Critic, i. 1.

When therefore I say that I have no ear, you will understand me to mean—for music.

Lamb, Chapter on Ears.

And men who have the gift of playing on an instrument by ear are sometimes afraid to learn by rule, lest they should lose it.

J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 323.

6. A careful or favorable hearing; attention; heed.

I cried unto God with my voice, . . . and he gave ear unto me.

Ps. lxxvii. 1.

I gape as good ears, and do consider as well the taulke that passed, as any one did there.

Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 19.

Give every man thine ear, but few thy voice.

Shak., Hamlet, i. 3.

But the bigots and flatterers who had his ear gave him advice which he was but too willing to take.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng. vi.

7. Disposition to listen; judgment; taste.

He laid his sense closer, and in fewer words, according to the style and ear of those times.

Sir J. Denham.

8. A part of any inanimate object having some likeness to the external ear. (a) A projection from the side of a vessel or utensil made to be used as a handle: as, the ears of a jar, pitcher, or other vessel.

Each bottle had a curling ear,
Through which the belt he drew,
And hung a bottle on each side,
To make his balance true.

Cowper, John Gilpin.

Over the fireplace were . . . iron candlesticks hanging by their ears.

S. Judd, Margaret, ii. 7.

(b) That part of a bell by which it is suspended; the canon. See first cut under bell. (c) A plate of soft metal at the mouth of the mouthpiece of an organ, used to qualify the tone by being put more or less over the opening. (d) The loop or ring by which the ram of a pile-driver is raised. (e) In printing, a projecting piece on the edge of the frisket or of the composing-rule. E. H. Knight. (f) One of the holes bored in a spherical projectile for the insertion of the points of the shell-hooks used in manipulating it.

9. In arch., same as crosslet, 1 (a).—A lea in the ear. See lea.—All ear or ears, listening intently; giving close attention to sounds or utterances.

I was all ear,
And took in strains that might create a soul
Under the ribs of death.

Milton, Comus, l. 560.

For at these [pulpit] performances she was all attention, all ear; she kept her heart fixed and intent on its holy work, by keeping her eye from wandering.

Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. vi.

Ass's ear, a kind of sea-ear, Haliotis asininus, a fine iridescent shell used in the manufacture of buttons, for inlaying woodwork, and for other purposes. See abalone, Haliotis, ormer.—At first earl, at first hearing; immediately. Davies.

A third cause of common errors is the credulity of men, that is, an easie assent to what is obtruded, or a believing at first ear what is delivered by others.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 5.

Barrel of the ear. Same as tympanium.—By the ears, in a state of discord or contention.

All Heav'n is by the Ears together,

Since first that little Rogue came hither.

Prior, Cupid and Ganymede.

Cheeks and earst. See cheek.—Dionysius's ear. (a) The name given to a secret subterranean ear-shaped passage connecting the palace of Dionysius the Elder, first tyrant of Syracuse (died 367 B. C.), with his stone-quarry prisons, through which he was able to overhear the conversation of his prisoners. (b) An aural instrument for the use of very deaf persons. It has a large pavilion secured by a swivel to a stand upon the floor, and an elastic tube with a nozzle to be held to the ear. E. H. Knight.—Drum of the ear. Same as tympanium.—Over head and ears. See up to the ears, below.—To fall together by the ears, to go together by the ears, to engage in a fight or scuffle; quarrel.

They will, instead of eating peaceably, fall together by the ears, each single one impatient to have all to itself.

Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iv. 7.

To give ear to. See give.—To meet the ear. See meet.—To set by the ears, to make strife between; cause to quarrel.

Who ever hears of fat men heading a riot, or herding together in turbulent mobs?—no—no—it is your lean, hungry men who are continually worrying society, and setting the whole community by the ears.

Irvine, Knickerbocker, p. 157.

To sleep upon both ears, to sleep soundly.

Let him set his heart at rest; I will remove this scruple out of his mind, that he may sleep securely upon both ears.

Abp. Bramhall, Works, III. 518.

Touching the ears, in the early church, a part of the ceremony of baptizing catechumens, consisting of touching the ears, and saying "Ephphatha" (be opened), a symbol of the opening of the understanding.—Up to the ears, over the ears, over head and ears, deeply absorbed or engrossed; overwhelmed: as, over head and ears in debt, or in business.

This Phedra out of hand got him a certain singing wench, skilful in musicke, and fell in love with her over the ears.

Terence (trans.), 1614.

Shak., Lear, II. 1.

earl (ēr'l), n. [ME. erl, earlier eorl, earl, as a designation of rank, < AS. eorl, an earl, a nobleman of high rank, nearly equiv. to ealdorman (see alderman); first in the Kentish laws, but its common use as a title and designation of office begins with the Scandinavian invasion, through the influence of the cognate Icel. Sw. Dan. jarl, Icel. orig. earl, in the earliest Scand. use a man above the rank of a 'earl' or churl, then, esp. as a Norw. and Dan. title, an earl; the earlier AS. use occurs only in poetry, eorl, a man, esp. a warrior (pl. earlas, men, warriors, the people, as an army), = OS. erl, a man, = OHG. erl, only in proper names; cf. Heruli, Eruhi, the LL. form of the name of a people of northern Germany, prob. 'the warriors', OS. pl. erlos, AS. eorlas, etc. Further origin unknown; it is impossible to derive eorl from ealdor, a chief, as has been suggested.] A British title of nobility designating a nobleman of the third rank, being that next below a marquis and next above a viscount. Earl was the highest title until 1337, when the first duke was created; and it fell to the third rank in 1386, on the creation of the title of marquis. The earl formerly had the government of a shire, and was called shireman. After the conquest, when their office was first made hereditary, earls were for a time called counts, and from them shires took the name of counties; the wife of an earl is still called countess. Earl is now a mere title, unconnected with territorial jurisdiction, so much so that several earls have taken as their titles their own names with the prefix Earl, as Earl Grey, Earl Spencer, Earl Russell. An earl's coronet consists of a richly chased circle of gold, having on its upper edge eight strawberry-leaves, alternating with eight pearls, each raised on a spike higher than the leaves, and with a cap, etc., as in a duke's coronet. See cut under coronet.

A Duke's Eldest sonnes be Earles, and all the rest of his sonns are Lords, with the Addition of there Christen name, as Lord Thomas, Lord Henry.

Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), I. 27.

My thanes and kinsmen,

In such an honour nam'd. Shak., Macbeth, v. 7.

The government was entrusted to a magistrate with the title of Ealdorman, or its Danish equivalent Earl.
E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, I. 52.

The ancient dignity of the earl has in former centuries been traced throughout its history. In very few instances was the title annexed to a simple town or castle.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 428.

Earl marshal, the eighth great officer of state in Great Britain. He is the head of the College of Arms (see Herald's College, under herald), determines all rival claims to arms, and grants armorial bearings, through the medium of the king-at-arms, to persons not possessed of hereditary arms. It is his duty also to direct all great ceremonies of state, and to make the formal proclamation of war or peace. The office was formerly of great importance, and was originally conferred by grant of the king (as early as the time of Richard II.), but is now hereditary in the family of the Howards, dukes of Norfolk, called the premier earls of England. (See marshal.) There were formerly also earls marshals in Scotland. See marischal.

earlet (ēr'let), n. [ear¹ + dim. -let.] 1. A small ear.—2. An ear-riding.

And he said to them: I desire one request of you: Give me the earlets of your spoils. For the Israelites were accustomed to wear golden earlets.

Judges viii. 24 (Douay version).

3. In bot., an auricle, as in certain foliose Hepatica.

earlid (ēr'lid), n. [ear¹ + lid. Cf. eyelid.] In zool., a valvular external cutaneous ear which can be shut down upon the auditory opening.

The tympanic membranes [of the crocodile] are exposed, but a cutaneous valve, or earlid, lies above each and can be shut down over it.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 214.

ear-lifter (ēr'lif'ter), n. [ear², n., + lifter.] A projecting guide on the knife-bar of a harvester to assist in lifting fallen or storm-beaten grain, so that it can be cut by the machine.

earliness (ēr'li-nes), n. The state or fact of being early; a state of advance or forwardness; a state of being prior to something else, or at the beginning.

The goodness of the crop is great gain, if the goodness answers the earliness of coming up. Bacon.

Thy earliness doth me assure,

Thou art up-rous'd by some distemp'rance.

Shak., R. and J., II. 3.

I have prayed your son Halbert that we may strive tomorrow with the sun's earliness to wake a stag from his lair.

In embryol., very young; very recently formed: as, an early embryo.—Early English. See English.—Early English architecture, the Pointed style of mediæval architecture in England, which was developed from and succeeded the Norman at the close of the twelfth and in the early part of the thirteenth century. It is characterized in general by purity and simplicity of lines, combined with delicacy, refinement, and grace. The columns and shafts are more slender than those of the preceding style, and foliage in some instances sprouts out from the central pillar between the shafts: the moldings are more delicately curved, and are alternated with hollows so as to give beautiful effects of light and shade: the capitals frequently have the form of an inverted bell, and are often enriched with foliage, as of the trefoil, rising from the neck-molding and swelling outward beneath the abacus; the towers are loftier and are often crowned by spires; the buttresses project boldly; the vaults are groined, and the graceful wall-arcades often have their spandrels filled with sculpture. The most distinctive features of the Early English style, however, are the pointed arches and long, narrow, lancet-headed windows, without mullions. Toward the end of the period the windows be-

That when we come to earnest them with men,

We may them better use.

Pastor Fido (1602), sig. E 1.

earnest² (ēr'nest), n. [With excrecent -t, < ME. ernes, ernes, a pledge, < W. ernes, a pledge, ern, a pledge, erno, give a pledge. Cf. L. arrha, arra, earnest: see arrles and arrha.] 1. A portion of something given or done in advance as a pledge; security in kind; specifically, in law, a part of the price of goods or service bargained for, which is paid at the time of the bargain to evidence the fact that the negotiation has ended in an actual contract. Hence it is said to bind the bargain. Sometimes the earnest, if trifling in amount, is not taken into account in the reckoning.

Giving them some money in hand as an earnest of the rest.

Ludlow, Memoirs.

2. Anything that gives pledge, promise, assurance, or indication of what is to follow; first-fruits.

Poul tellth in this epistle of freedom of Cristene men,

Milton, Eikonoklastes, i.

Ev'ry moment's calm that soothes the breast

Is giv'n in earnest of eternal rest.

Cowper, An Epistle.

=Syn. Earnest, Pledge. Earnest, like pledge, is security given for the doing of something definite in the future, and generally returned when the conditions of the contract have been fulfilled. In 2 Cor. i. 22 and v. 5 we read that the Spirit is given as the earnest of indefinite future favors from God; in Blackstone we find "a penny, or any portion of the goods delivered as earnest." Whether literal or figurative, earnest is always a pledge in kind, a part paid or given in warrant that more of the same kind is forthcoming; as in "Macbeth," i. 3, Macbeth is hailed thane of Cawdor "for an earnest of a greater honor." See also "Cymbeline," i. 6. Pledge is often used figuratively for that which seems promised or indicated by the actions of the present, earnest being preferred for that which is of the same nature with the thing promised, and pledge for that which is materially different.

Man, if not yet fully installed in his powers, has given much earnest of his claims.

Marg. Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 15.

Seldom has so much promise, seldom have so great earnests of great work, been so sadly or so fatally blighted.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 10.

Bright pledge of peace and sunshine.

Vaughan, The Rainbow.

earnest² (ēr'nest), v. t. [< earnest², n.] To serve as an earnest or a pledge of.

H. N. Ozenham, Short Studies, p. 140.

They who have no religious earnestness are at the mercy, day by day, of some new argument or fact, which may overtake them, in favor of one conclusion or the other.

J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 414.

2. Anxious care; solicitude; strength of feeling; seriousness: as, a man of great earnestness; the charge was maintained with much earnestness.

I learn that there is truth and firmness and an earnestness of doing good alive in the world.

Donne, Letters, xlvi.

=Syn. 1. Zeal, Enthusiasm, etc. See eagerness.

earnest-penny (ér'nest-pen'i), n. Same as earnest-money.

Accept this gift, most rare, most fine, most new;
The earnest-penny of a love so fervent.
Ford, Love's Sacrifice, li. 2.

An argument of greater good hereafter, and an earnest-penny of the perfection of the present grace, that is, of the rewards of glory. Ser. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 265.

ear-net (ér'net), n. A covering for the ears of horses, made of netted cord, to keep out flies.
earnful (ér'nful), a. [A var. of yearnful.] Full of anxiety; causing anxiety or yearning.

The earnful smart which eats my breast.
P. Fletcher, Piscatory Eclogues, v.

earning (ér'ning), n. [< ME. ernung, ernung, < AS. earnung, earning (= OHG. arnunc, arnunga), desert, reward, verbal n. of earnian, earn: see earn.] That which is earned; that which is gained or merited by labor, service, or performance; reward; wages; compensation: used chiefly in the plural.

This is the great expense of the poor that takes up almost all their earnings. Locke.

A tax on that part of profits known as earnings of management. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 88.

earning (ér'ning), n. [Verbal n. of earn, v.] Rennet. Brockett. [Prov. Eng.]

earning-grass (ér'ning-gräs), n. The common butterwort, Pinguicula vulgaris: so called from its property of curdling milk. [Prov. Eng.]

ear-pick (ér'pik), n. An instrument for cleaning the ear.

ear-piece (ér'pēs), n. [Tr. of F. oreillère.] A name given to the side-piece of the burget or open helmet of the sixteenth century, usually made of splints, and covering a leather strap or chin-band to which they are riveted. Compare cheek-piece. Also called oreillère.

ear-piercer (ér'pēr'sēr), n. [Tr. of F. perce-oreille.] The earwig.

ear-piercing (ér'pēr'sing), a. Piercing the ear, as a shrill or sharp sound.

O, farewell!
Farewell the neighing steed, and the shrill trump,
The spirit-stirring drum, the ear-piercing fife.
Shak., Othello, iii. 3.

ear-pocket (ér'pok'et), n. The little pouch formed by a fold of skin at the root of the outer ear of some animals, as the cat.

ear-reach (ér'rēch), n. Hearing-distance; ear-shot. [Rare.]

The sound of it might have pierced your senses with gladness, had you been in ear-reach of it.

B. Jonson, Epicæne, li. 2.
Some invisible ear might be in ambush within the ear-reach of his words.
Fuller, Holy State.

ear-rent (ér'rent), n. Payment made by laceration or loss of the ears.

A hole to thrust your heads in, ear-ring (ér'ring), n. [< ME. erering, eerryng, < AS. eārhring (= D. oerring = OHG. öriring, MHG. öriring, < örring = Sw. öriring = Dan. örering), < eäre, ear, + hring, ring: see ear¹ and ring¹.] A ring or other ornament, usually of gold or silver, and with or without precious stones, worn at the ear, the usual means of attachment being the ring itself, or a hook or projection which forms a part of it, passing through the lobe. Among Orientals ear-rings have been used by both sexes from the earliest times. In England they were worn by the Romanized Britons and by Anglo-Saxons. After the tenth century the fashion seems to have declined throughout Europe, and ear-rings are neither found in graves nor seen in paintings or sculptures. The wearing of ear-rings was reintroduced into England in the sixteenth century, and Stubbs, writing in the time of Queen Elizabeth, says, "The women are not ashamed to make holes in their ears whereto they hang rings and other jewels of gold and precious stones." The use of ear-rings by women has continued to the present time. In the seventeenth century they were worn by men; and seafaring men, especially of the southern nations of Europe, have retained the use of them, commonly in the form of gold hoops, down to our own times. Among women the shape of ear-rings changes completely with the fashions, long, heavy pendants being succeeded by smaller ones, and these by single stones in almost invisible chignons, set close to the lobe of the ear.
For which you should pay ear-rent. B. Jonson.

Without earrings of silver or some other metal . . . you shall see no Russe woman, be she wife or maide.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 497.

ear-rivet (ér'riv'et), n. One of the ottoporpe of a hydrozoan. See ottoporpa.

Earse, n. See Erse.

earsh, ersh (érsh), n. [E. dial., also errish, erige, arish, and by contraction ash, < ME. asche, stubble, appar. corrupted, by association with asche, ashes, from reg. ersch*, *< AS. *ersc, arisc, found only in comp. ersc-hen, arisc-hen, equiv. to edisc-hen, a quail (see edish-hen), edisc, and presumably ersc, arisc, meaning a pasture, a park for game: see eddish. The ult. origin and the relations of the two words are not clear.] Stubble; a stubble-field: same as eddish, 1.

ear-shell (ér'shel), n. The common name of any shell of the family Haliotidae; a sea-ear: so called from the shape.—Guernsey ear-shell, Haliotis tuberculata: same as ormer.

ear-shot (ér'shot), n. Reach of hearing; the distance at which words may be heard.

Gomez, stand you out of ear-shot. I have something to say to your wife in private. Dryden, Spanish Friar.

There were numerous heavy oaken benches, which, by the united efforts of several men, might be brought within earshot of the pulpit. Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, vi.

ear-shrift (ér'shrift), n. Auricular confession.

The Papists' lenten preparation of forty days' earshrift. Cartwright, Admonition.

Your earshrift (one part of your penance) is to no purpose. Calfhill, Answer to Martiall, p. 243.

ear-snail (ér'snāl), n. A snail of the family Otinidae.

ear-sore (ér'sör), a. and n. I. a. Morose; quarrelsome; apt to take offense.

II. n. Something that offends the ear.

The perpetual jangling of the chimes to all the great towns of Flanders is no small ear-sore to us. Tom Brown, Works, I. 306.

earst, adv. An archaic spelling of erst.

ear-stone (ér'stōn), n. An otolith. The substance of these concretions is often called brain ivory (which see, under ivory).

ear-string (ér'string), n. An ornamental appendage worn by men in the seventeenth century; a silk cord, usually black, passed through the lobe of the ear and hanging in two, four, or more strands, sometimes so low as to lie upon the shoulder, sometimes only two or three inches long. In all the representations of this fashion it is limited to the left ear.

earth (érth), n. [Early mod E. also erth; *< ME. erthe, eorthe, < AS. eorthe = OS. ertha, ertha = OFries. erthe, irthe, erde, NFries. yerd = MD. erde, aerde, D. aarde = MLG. erde = OHG. erda, ertha, MHG. G. erde = Icel. jörð = Sw. jörd = Dan. jörd = Goth. airtha, earth (OTeut. *ertha, in L. as Hertha, as the name of a goddess); allied to OHG. ero, earth, Icel. jörð, gravel, Gr. ἐπα-ζε, to the earth, on the ground. Usually, but without much probability, referred to the √ ar, plow, whence ear³, earth², eard, arable, etc.] 1. The terraqueous globe which we inhabit. It is one of the planets of the solar system, being the third in order from the sun. The figure of the earth is approximately that of an ellipsoid of revolution or oblate spheroid, the axes of which measure 12,756,506 meters and 12,713,042 meters, or 7,926 statute miles and 1,041 yards, and 7,899 statute miles and 1,023 yards, respectively, thus making the compression 1:293. The radius of the earth, considered as a sphere, is 3,958 miles. The mean density of the whole earth is 5.6, or about twice that of the crust, and its interior is probably metallic. The earth revolves upon its axis in one sidereal day, which is 3 minutes and 55.91 seconds shorter than a mean solar day. Its axis remains nearly parallel to itself, but has a large but slow gyration which produces the precession of the equinoxes. The whole earth revolves about the sun in an ellipse in one sidereal year, which is 365 days, 6 hours, 9 minutes, and 9 seconds. The ecliptic, or plane of the earth's orbit, is inclined to the equator by 23° 27' 12". 68 mean obliquity for January 0, 1890, according to Hansen. The earth is distant from the sun by about 93,000,000 miles.*

A nobill tree, thou secomore;
I blisse hym that the on the erthe brought.
York Plays, p. 214.

One expression only in the Old Testament gives us the word earth in its astronomical meaning,—that in the twenty-sixth chapter of Job:—

"He stretched out the north over empty space;
He hanged the earth upon nothing."
Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 104.

It appears, . . . from what we know of the tides of the ocean, that the earth as a whole is more rigid than glass, and therefore that no very large portion of its interior can be liquid. Clerk Maxwell, Heat, p. 21.

Sir W. Thomson has calculated that, if no change has occurred in the order of things, it cannot have been more than 200,000 years since the earth was in the condition of a mass of molten matter, on which a solid crust was just beginning to form. Clerk Maxwell, Heat, p. 248.

2. The solid matter of the globe, in distinction from water and air; the materials composing the solid parts of the globe; hence, the firm land of the earth's surface; the ground: as, he fell to the earth.

God called the dry land earth. Gen. i. 10.

3. The loose material of the earth's surface; the disintegrated particles of solid matter, in distinction from rock; more particularly, the combinations of particles constituting soil, mold, or dust, as opposed to unmixed sand or clay. Earth, being regarded by ancient philosophers as simple, was called an element; and in popular language we still hear of the four elements, fire, air, earth, and water.

Withinne a litil tyme ge schal se al the gold withinne the Mercurie turned into erthe as sotile as flour.

Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnival), p. 8.

Two mules' burden of earth. 2 Ki. v. 17.

The majority of the cities and towns [of Greece] complied with the demand made upon them, and gave the [Persian] king earth and water.

Von Ranke, Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 165.

4. The inhabitants of the globe; the world.

The whole earth was of one language. Gen. xi. 1.

She is the hopeful lady of my earth. Shak., R. and J., i. 2.

5. Dirt; hence, something low or mean.
What ho! slave! Caliban!
Thou earth, thou! speak. Shak., Tempest, i. 2.

6. The hole in which a fox or other burrowing animal hides itself.
Seeing I never stray'd beyond the cell,
But live like an old badger in his earth.
Tennyson, Holy Grail.

7. In chem., a name formerly given to certain inodorous, dry, and unflammable substances which are metallic oxides, but were formerly regarded as elementary bodies. They are insoluble in water, difficultly fusible, and not easily reduced to the metallic state. The most important of them are alumina, zirconia, glucina, yttria, and ceria. The alkaline earths, baryta, strontia, lime, and magnesia, have more the properties of the alkalis, being somewhat soluble in water, and having an alkaline taste and reaction.

8. In elect.: (a) The union of any point of a telegraph-line, submarine cable, or any system of conductors charged with or conveying electricity with the ground. It is generally made by joining the point at which the earth is to be established by means of a good conductor with a metallic plate buried in moist earth, or with metallic water-pipes or gas-pipes, which, on account of their large surface of contact with the earth, usually afford excellent earth-connections. (b) A fault in a telegraph-line or cable, arising out of an accidental contact of some part of the metallic circuit with the earth or with more or less perfect conductors connected with the earth.—Adamic earth. See Adamic.—Aris of the earth. See axis.—Bad earth, in elect., a connection with the earth in which great resistance is offered to the passage of the current.—Black earth, a kind of coal which is pounded fine and used by painters in fresco.—Chian earth. See Chian.—Cologne earth, a kind of light bastard ochre, of a deep-brown color, transparent, and durable in water-color painting. It is an earthy variety of lignite or partially fossilized wood, and occurs in an irregular bed from 80 to 50 feet deep near Cologne, whence the name.—Compression of the earth. See compression.—Dead earth, or total earth, in elect., an earth-connection offering almost no resistance to the passage of the current, as when a telegraph-wire falls upon a railroad-track, or when the conductor of a submarine cable has a considerable surface in actual contact with the water.—Earth of alum, a substance obtained by precipitating the earth from alum dissolved in water by adding ammonia or potassa. It is used for paints.—Earth of bone, a phosphate of lime existing in bones after calcination.—Ends of the earth. See end.—Figure of the earth, the shape and size, not of the earth's surface, but of the mean sea-level continued under the land at the heights at which water would stand in canals open to the sea; also, the generalized figure or ellipsoid which most nearly coincides with the figure of the sea-level.

If Lactantius affirm that the figure of the earth is plane, or Austin deny there are antipodes, though venerable fathers of the church and ever to be honoured, yet will not their authorities prove sufficient to ground a belief thereon. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 7.

Good earth, in elect., a connection with the earth in which the current meets with little resistance in its passage from the wire or conductor to the earth.—Heavy earth. Same as baryta.—Intermittent earth, in elect., an earth-connection such as is produced by a wire touching at intervals conducting bodies in connection with the earth.—Magnetic poles of the earth. See magnetic.—Partial earth, in elect., a poor earth-connection, such as exists when a telegraph-wire rests upon the ground, when its insulators are defective, or when it touches any conductor connected with the earth, but offering considerable resistance.—To bring to the earth, to bury. Eng. Glids.—To put to earth, in elect., to join or connect a conductor with the earth.—To run to earth, in hunting, to chase the game, as a fox, to its hole or burrow.—Syn. I. Earth, World, Globe. Earth is used as the distinctive name of our planet in the solar system, as Mercury, Venus, Earth, Mars, etc. It is used not only of soil, but of the planet regarded as material, and also as the home of the human race. (See Job i. 7; Ps. lviii. 11.) World has especial application to the earth as inhabited; hence we say, he is gone to a better world; are there other worlds besides this? It belongs, therefore, especially to the surface of the earth; hence we speak of sailing around the world, but not the earth. Globe makes prominent the roundness of the earth: as, to circumnavigate the globe.

The first man is of the earth, earthly. 1 Cor. xv. 47.

The Sun flies forward to his brother Sun;
The dark Earth follows wher'd in her ellipse.

Tennyson, Golden Year.

Poets, whose thoughts enrich the blood of the world.

Tennyson, Princess, li.

In the four quarters of the globe, who reads an American book?

Sydney Smith, Rev. of Seybart's Annals of United States.

On the head of Frederic is all the blood which was shed in a war which raged during many years and in every quarter of the globe.

Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

earth¹ (érth), v. [= LG. erden = Icel. jardha = Sw. jorda = Dan. jorde, trans., earth, bury; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To hide in or as in the earth.

An you once earth yourself, John, in the barn,
I have no daughter vor you.

B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, v. 2.

The fox is earthed. Dryden, Spanish Friar.

2. To put underground; bury; inter.

Upon your grannam's grave, that very night
We earthed her in the shades.

B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, ii. 1.

Here silver swans with nightingales set spells,
Which sweetly charm the traveller, and raise Earth's earthed monarchs from their hidden cells.

John Rogers, To Anne Bradstreet.

But now he hath served the sentence out, . . .
Why not earth him and no more words?

T. B. Aldrich, The Jew's Gift.

3. To cover with earth or mold; choke with earth.

O thou, the fountain of whose better part
Is earth'd and gravel'd up with vain desire.

Quarles, Emblems, i. 7.

Earth up with fresh mould the roots of those auricles which the frost may have uncovered.

Evelyn, Calendarium Hortense.

4. In elect., to put to earth; place in connection with the earth.

In dry weather they [conductors] are not earthed at all well, and a strong charge may then surge up and down them, and light somebody else's gas in the most surprising way. Science, XII. 18.

II. intrans. To retire underground; burrow, as a hunted animal.

Huntsmen tell us that a fox when escaped from the dogs, after a hard chase, always walks himself cool before he earths. Bp. Horne, Essays and Thoughts.

Hence foxes earthed, and wolves abhorred the day,
And hungry churlies ensnared the nightly prey.

Tickell, Hunting.

earth² (érth), n. [E. dial., < earð, plow, + -th, noun-formative; early record is wanting, but earð, q. v., in the sense of 'plowing' (OHG. art), is nearly the same word.] 1†. The act of plowing; a plowing.

Such land as ye break up for barley to sow,
Two earths at the least, ere ye sow it, bestow.

Tusser, Husbandry.

2. A day's plowing. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

earth-auger (érth'á'gér), n. Same as earth-borer.

earth-ball (érth'bál), n. The truffle, Tuber cibarium, which grows in the soil, and produces its spores within tuber-like bodies.

earth-bath (érth'báth), n. A remedy occasionally used, consisting of a bath of earth or mud.

earth-board (érth'bórd), n. The board of a plow that turns over the earth; the mold-board.

earth-borer (érth'bór'ér), n. A form of auger for boring holes in the ground, in which the twisted shank revolves inside a cylindrical box with a valve, which retains the earth till the tool is withdrawn. Also called earth-auger, earth-boring auger. See cut under auger.

earth-born (érth'börn), a. 1. Born of the earth; springing originally from the earth: as, the fabled earth-born giants.

Creatures of other mould, earth-born perhaps,
Not spirits. Milton, P. L., iv. 360.

2. Arising from or occasioned by earthly considerations.

All earth-born cares are wrong. Goldsmith.

3. Of low birth; meanly born.

Earth-born Lycan shall ascend the throne. Smith.

earth-bound (érth'bóund), a. Fastened by the pressure of earth; firmly fixed in the earth; hence, figuratively, bound by earthly ties or interests.

Who can impress the forest; bid the tree
Unfix his earth-bound root? Shak., Macbeth, iv. 1.

earth-bred (érth'bred), a. Low; groveling.

Peasants, I'll curb your headstrong impudence,
And make you tremble when the lion roars, Ye earthbred worms. A. Breuer (?), Lingua, i. 6.

earth-chestnut (érth'ches'nút), n. The earth-nut.

earth-closet (érth'kloz'et), n. A night-stool, or some convenience of that kind, in which the feces are received and covered by dry earth.

earth-crab (érth'kráb), n. An occasional name of the mole-cricket, Gryllotalpa vulgaris.

earth-created (érth'krē-á'ted), a. Formed of earth.

And an eternity, the date of gods,
Descended on poor earth-created man!
Young, Night Thoughts, ix. 220.

earth-current (érth'kúr'ent), n. See current.

earth-din[†] (érth'dín), n. [ME. erthedine, -dyn, -dene, < AS. eorthe-dyne, an earthquake, < eorthe, earth, + dyne, a loud sound, din.] An earthquake.

Pestilences and hungers sal be,
And erthedynes in many contre.
Hampole, Prick of Conscience, l. 4035.

earth-drake (érth'drák), n. [ME. erthdrake*, < AS. eorth-draca, < eorthe, earth, + draca, drake, dragon.] In Anglo-Saxon myth., a mythical monster resembling the dragon of chivalry.

He sacrifices his own life in destroying a frightful earth-drake, or dragon. W. Spalding.

earth-eater (érth'ē'tér), n. 1. One who or that which eats earth.—2. In ornith., specifically, Nyctibius grandis, the ibigau (which see).

earthen (ér'thn), a. [ME. erthen, eorthen (AS. not recorded) = D. aarden = OHG. erdān, irdān, MHG. erdān, erden, G. erden, now irden = Goth. airtheins, earthen; as *earth*¹ + -en.] Made of earth; made of clay or other earthy substance: as, an earthen vessel.

Go, and tac the erthene litil wyvnessel of the crockere.

Wyclif, Jer. xix. 1.

A beggarly account of empty boxes,
Green earthen pots, bladders, and musty seeds.

Shak., R. and J., v. 1.

Do not grudge
To pick out treasures from an earthen pot.

Herbert.

earthenware (ér'thn-wār), n. Vessels or other objects of clay (whether alone or mixed with other mineral substances) baked or fired in a kiln, or more rarely sun-dried or otherwise prepared without firing. The term is often restricted to the coarser qualities, as distinguished from porcelain and stoneware and from terra-cotta. In this sense earthenware may be known from porcelain by its opacity, and from stoneware by its porosity, which latter quality may be recognized by touching a fracture with the tongue, when the tongue will adhere to the porous earthenware, but not to stoneware. Earthenware may be either unglazed, as bricks, ordinary flower-pots, etc., or enameled. See del'2, faience, majolica.

Earthenware is described as a soft, opaque material formed of an earthy mixture, refractory, or hard to fuse, in the kiln.

Wheatley and Delamotte, Art Work in Earthenware, p. 1.

earth-fall (érth'fál), n. [= OFries. irthfal, erthfel, erdfal = G. erdfall, a sinking of the earth, = Icel. jardhfal = Dan. jordfald = Sw. jordfall, an earth-fall.] Same as land-slide.

earth-fast (érth'fást), a. [ME. erthfeste*, < AS. erthfast*, eorthfest, < eorthe, earth, + fast, fast.] Firm in the earth, and difficult to be removed.

earth-fed (érth'fed), a. Fed upon earthly things; low; groveling.

Such earthfed minds
That never tasted the true heaven of love.

B. Jonson.

earth-flax (érth'flaks), n. A fine variety of asbestos, with long, flexible, parallel filaments resembling flax.

earth-flea (érth'flē), n. A name of the chigoe, Sarcophylla penetrans: so called from its living in the earth. See cut under chigoe.

earth-fly (érth'fī), n. Same as earth-flea.

earth-foam (érth'fóm), n. Same as apophite.

earth-gall (érth'gál), n. [ME. erthe-galle*, < AS. eorthe-galla, < eorthe, earth, + galla, gall.] 1. A plant of the gentian family, especially the lesser centaury, Erythraea Centaurium: so called from its bitterness.—2. In the United States, the green hellebore, Veratrum viride.

earth-hog (érth'hóg), n. The aardvark. Also called earth-pig. See Oryzopteropus.

earth-holer, n. [ME. eorthehole.] A cave.

earth-house (érth'hous), n. [Sc. eidr, eadr, yird-house (see eadr, 2); < ME. erthus, erthhus, < AS. eorth-hūs (= Icel. jardh-hūs = Dan. jordhūs = G. erdhaus), a cave, den, < eorthe, earth, + hūs, house.] The name generally given throughout Scotland to the underground structures known as "Picts' houses" or "Picts' dwellings." The earth-house in its simplest form consists of a single irregular-shaped chamber, formed of unburnt stones, the side walls gradually converging toward the top until they can be roofed by stones 4 or 5 feet in width, the whole covered in by a mound of earth rising slightly above the level of the surrounding country. The more advanced form has two or three chambers. Earth-houses are frequent in the northeast of Scotland, occasionally thirty or forty being found in the same locality, as in the Moor of Clova, Kildrumny, Aberdeenshire. Querns, bones, deer's horns, plates of stone or slate, earthen vessels, cups and implements of bone, stone celts, bronze swords, etc., are occasionally unearthed in or near them. Similar structures are found in Ireland. See beehive house, under beehive.

earth-inductor (érth'in-duk'tor), n. In elect., a coil of wire arranged so as to be capable of rotation in a magnetic field, and connected with a galvanometer by means of which the induced current of electricity can be measured. It is used for measuring the strength of magnetic fields as compared with that of the earth.

earthiness (ér'thi-nes), n. 1. The quality of being earthy, or of containing earth.

[He] freed rain-water . . . from its accidental, and as it were feculent earthiness. Boyle, Works, III. 103.

2. Intellectual or spiritual coarseness; grossness.

The grossness and earthiness of their fancy. Hammond.

earthliness (érth'li-nes), n. 1. The quality of being earthy; grossness.—2. Worldliness; strong attachment to earthly things.—3†. Want of durability; perishableness; frailty.

Fuller.

earthling (érth'ling), n. [Not found in ME. (cf. AS. eorthing, yrthing, a farmer, a tiller of the earth) (= G. erdling); < *earth*¹ + -ling.] 1†. An inhabitant of the earth; a creature of this world; a mortal.

Humorous earthlings will control the stars.

B. Jonson, Masque of Hymen.

To earthlings, the footstool of God, that stage which he raised for a small time, seemeth magnificent.

Drummond.

2. One strongly attached to worldly things; a worldling.

earthly (érth'li), a. [ME. erthly, ertheli, eorthe-li, -liche, -lic, < AS. eorthlic (= OHG. erdlih = Icel. jardhligr), < eorthe, earth, + -lic, E. -ly.] 1. Pertaining to the earth or to this world; pertaining to the mundane state of existence: as, earthly objects; earthly residence.

Eorthe honeste thynges was offred thus at ones,
Thorgh three kynde kynges kneolyng to Iesu.

Piers Plowman (C), xxii. 94.

When the bretheren of Gawein com thider ther be-gan the doell and sorowe so grete that noon earthy man myght devise noon gretter.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 300.

Our earthly house of this tabernacle. 2 Cor. v. 1.

2. Belonging to the earth or world; worldly; carnal, as opposed to spiritual or heavenly; vile.

How is he born in whom we did knowe non erthely de-lyte.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 1.

Whose glory is in their shame, who mind earthly things.

Phil. iii. 19.

This earthly load
Of death, call'd life. Milton, Sonnets, ix.

Myself

Am lonelier, darker, earthlier for my loss.

Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

3†. Made of earth; earthy: as, "earthly substance," Holland.—4. Corporeal; not mental.

Great grace that old man to him given had,
For God he often saw, from heaven sight,
All were his earthly eyen both blunt and bad.

Spenser, F. Q.

5. Being or originating on earth; of all things in the world; possible; conceivable: used chiefly as an expletive.

What earthly benefit can be the result? Pope.

It is passing strange that, during the long period of their education, the rising generation should never hear an earthly syllable about the constitution and administration of their nation.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVI. 29.

= Syn. 1. Terrestrial, mundane, sublunary, etc. See worldly.

earthly-minded (érth'li-mín'ded), a. Having a mind devoted to earthly things.

earthly-mindedness (érth'li-mín'ded-nes), n. Grossness; sensuality; devotion to earthly objects; earthliness.

earth-mad[†] (érth'mád), n. [< *earth*¹ + *mad*², a worm.] A kind of worm or grub.

The earth-mads and all the sorts of worms . . . are without eyes. Holland.

earth-moss (érth'mós), n. A book-name for a moss of the genus Phascum.

earthnut (érth'nút), n. [ME. erthnote*, < AS. eorth-nutu for eorth-hnutu* (= D. aardnoot = G. erdnuss = Dan. jordnød = Sw. jordnöt), < eorthe, earth, + hnutu, nut.] 1. The tuberous root of Bunium flexuosum and B. Bulbocastanum, common umbelliferous plants of Europe. See Bunium.—2. The groundnut, Arachis hypogæa.—3. The tuber of Cyperus rotundus and some other species of the same genus.

earth-oil (érth'oil), n. Same as petroleum.

earth-pea (érth'pē), n. See pea.

earth-pig (érth'pig), n. Same as earth-hog.

earth-pit (érth'pit), n. A trench or pit, covered with glass, for protecting plants from frost.

earth-plate (érth'plát), n. In elect., a metallic plate buried in the ground, forming the earth-connection of a telegraph-wire, lightning-conductor, or other electrical appliances.

earthpuff (érth'puf), n. A species of Lycoperdon; the puffball.

Tuberes, mushrooms, tadstooles, earthturfes, earthpuffs.
Nomenclator (1685).

earth-pulsation (érth'pul-sá'shön), n. A slow wave-like movement of the surface of the earth. Such movements, in general, escape attention on account of their long period.

earthquake (érth'kwäk), n. [ME. erthequake, < erthe, earth, + quake, quake. The AS. words were eorþ-bifung, -beafung (bifung, trembling), eorþ-dyne (dyne, din), eorþ-styrung (styrung, stirring), eorþstyrennis. Cf. earth-din.] A movement or vibration of a part of the earth's crust. Such movements are of every degree of violence, from those that are scarcely perceptible without the aid of apparatus specially contrived for the purpose to those which overthrow buildings, rend the ground asunder, and destroy thousands of human lives. The duration of earthquakes is as variable as their intensity. Sometimes there is a single shock, lasting only a second or two; at other times a great number of shocks occur in succession, separated by greater or less intervals of time, the earth not being reduced to complete quiescence for weeks or even months. It is not known that any portion of the earth's surface is entirely exempt from earthquakes; but there are large areas where no very destructive ones have ever occurred, either in the memory of man or as recorded in history. The regions most frequently visited by destructive shocks are those where active volcanoes exist, those near high mountain-ranges, and those where the rocks are of recent geological age, and are much disturbed or uplifted. Such regions are the vicinity of the Mediterranean, the shores of the Pacific and the adjacent islands, the neighborhood of the Alps, and the East India islands. Regions not liable to seismic disturbances are the whole of northeastern North America, the east side of South America, the north of Asia, and a large part of Africa. An earthquake shock is a wave-like motion of a part of the earth's crust, and, in the words of Humboldt, is one of the ways in which the reaction of the interior of the earth against its exterior makes itself manifest. The most destructive earthquake of which we have any knowledge was that of Lisbon. It began November 1st, 1755, and was felt over that part of the earth's surface included between Iceland on the north, Mogador in Morocco on the south, Toplitz in Bohemia on the east, and the West India islands on the west. The destruction of life and property occasioned by this shock was very great. The disturbance continued, especially in the vicinity of the Mediterranean, with short intermissions, for several months. On November 18th, 1755, the most violent shock occurred which has been felt in New England since its settlement by the whites. One of the most destructive earthquakes of recent occurrence was that which took place on the island of Ischia near Naples, July 28th, 1883, by which over 2,000 persons perished. By the earthquake at Mendoza, South America, on the 20th of March, 1861, over 12,000 persons lost their lives. A violent earthquake, most destructive in Charleston, South Carolina, and vicinity, occurred on the night of August 31st, 1886. See seismo, seismometer, and volcanism.

When the Jews hadden made the Temple, com an Erthquake, and cast it down (as God wold) and destroyed alle that thei had made.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 84.

And all the yle ys sor troubled with the seyd erthe quake Dyvye tymes. Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 18.

It was calculated . . . by Sir C. Lyell that an earthquake which occurred in Chili in 1822 added to the South-American continent a mass of rock more than equal in weight to a hundred thousand of the great pyramids of Egypt. Huxley, Physiography, p. 187.

Earthquake-shadow, that part of the earth's surface which is in some degree protected from an advancing earthquake-wave by the interposition of a mountain-range, hill, ravine, or other arrangement of the geological formation which offers an obstacle to its passage.

earth-shine (érth'shín), n. [earth + shine. Cf. moonshine, sunshine, starshine.] In astron., the faint light visible on the part of the moon not illuminated by the sun. It is due to the light which the earth reflects on the moon, and is most conspicuous soon after new moon, when the sun-illuminated part of the disk is smallest. This phenomenon is popularly described as "the old moon in the new moon's arms."

earth-smoke (érth'smök), n. [A translation of L. fumus terræ: fumus, smoke; terre, gen. of terra, earth: see fumitory and terrestrial.] The plant fumitory, Fumaria officinalis.

earth-star (érth'stär), n. [A translation of Gaster.] A fungus of the genus Gaster; a kind of puffball having a double peridium, the outer layer of which breaks into segments which become reflexed, forming a star-like structure about the base of the fungus.

earth-stopper (érth'stop'ér), n. - In hunting, one who stops up the earths of foxes to prevent their escape.

The earth-stopper is an important functionary in countries where there are many earths. Encyc. Brit., XII. 395.

earth-table (érth'tä'bl), n. In arch., a projecting course or plinth resting immediately upon the foundations. Also called grass-table and ground-table. See ledgment-table.

earth-tilting (érth'til'ting), n. A slight movement or displacement of the surface of the ground in some forms of earthquake.

Earth-tiltings show themselves by a slow bending and unbending of the surface, so that a post stuck in the ground, vertical to begin with, does not remain vertical, but inclines now to one side and now to another, the plane of the ground in which it stands shifting relatively to the horizon. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 626.

earth-tongue (érth'tung), n. The popular name given to club-shaped fungi of the genus Geoglossum, found in lawns and grassy pastures.

earth-treatment (érth'trét'ment), n. A method of treating wounds with clay (or clayey earth) dried and finely powdered. It is applied to the wound as a deodorizing agent, tending at the same time to prevent or arrest putrefaction. Thomas, Med. Diet.

earth-tremor (érth'trem'ör), n. A minute movement of the surface of the earth, resembling an earthquake in rapidity of oscillation, but on account of its small amplitude requiring instrumental means for its detection.

earthward, earthwards (érth'wärd, -wärdz), adv. [earth + -ward, -wards.] Toward the earth.

earth-wire (érth'wir), n. In elect., a wire used for joining conductors with the earth: especially applied to wires placed upon telegraph-poles for the purpose of conveying the leakage from the line to the earth, thus preventing interference by leakage from one line to another.

earthwolf (érth'wülf), n. The aardwolf. See Proteles.

earthwork (érth'wërk), n. [ME. erthewerk*, < AS. eorthweorc (= D. aardwerk = G. erdwerk = Dan. jordværk), < eorthe, earth, + weorc, work: see earth and work.] 1. In engin., any operation in which earth is removed or thrown up, as in cuttings, embankments, etc.—2. In fort., any offensive or defensive construction formed chiefly of earth: commonly in the plural. Hence —3. Any similar construction, as the ancient mounds of earth found in various parts of the United States, of unknown use and origin. They differ widely in form, but are always well defined in plan, and sometimes inclose large areas.

Anyhow, there the mound is, an earthwork which, if artificial it be, the Lady of the Mercians herself need not have been ashamed of. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 30.

earthworm (érth'wërm), n. [= D. aardworm = G. erdwurm; < earth + worm.] 1. The common name of the worms of the family Lumbricidae (which see), and especially of the genus Lumbricus, of which there are several species, one of the best-known being L. terrestris. They belong to the order of oligochaetous annelids. The earthworm has a cylindric vermiform body, tapering at both ends, segmented into a great number of rings, destitute of legs, eyes, or any appendages visible on ordinary inspection. It moves by the contraction of the successive segments of the body, aided by rows of bristles which are capable of being retracted. It is hermaphrodite, each individual of a pair impregnating the other in copulation, when the two are joined in two places by their respective clitella. Earthworms are highly useful, giving a kind of under-tillage to the land, loosening the soil, and rendering it more permeable to the air. According to Darwin, in his work on "The Formation of Vegetable Mould," etc., earthworms, from their enormous numbers, exercise a highly important agency not only in this respect, but in the creation and aggregation of new soil, the burial and preservation (as also the original disintegration) of organic remains of all kinds, etc. They are food for many birds, mammals, and other animals, and their value for bait is well known to the angler, whence they are often called angleworms or fishworms. These worms are mostly a few inches long, but there are species attaining a length of a yard or more.

The people who inhabit the highlands of Southern Brazil have a firm belief in the existence of a gigantic earthworm fifty yards or more in length, five in breadth, covered with bones as with a coat-of-mail, and of such strength as to be able to uproot great pine-trees as though they were blades of grass, and to throw up such quantities of clay in making its way underground as to dam up streams and divert them into new courses. This redoubtable monster is known as the "Minhocão."

Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 608.

2. Figuratively, a mean, sordid wretch.

Thy vain contempt, dull earthworm, cease. Norris.

earthworm-oil (érth'wërm-oil), n. A greenish oil obtained from earthworms, used as a remedy for earache.

earthy (ér'thi), a. [earth + -y.] 1. Of or pertaining to earth; consisting of earth; partaking of the nature of earth; terrene: as, earthy matter.—2. Resembling earth or some of the properties of earth: as, an earthy taste or smell.

And catch the heavy earthy scents That blow from summer shores.

T. B. Aldrich, Piscataqua River.

3†. Inhabiting the earth; earthy.

Those earthy spirits black and envious are; I'll call up other gods of form more fair.

Dryden, Indian Emperor.

4. Gross; not refined.

So earthy as to need the dull material force Of eyes, or lips, or cheeks. Sir J. Denham.

5. In mineral., without luster, or dull, and roughish to the touch.—Earthy cobalt. See asbolan.—Earthy fracture, a fracture which exposes a rough, dull surface, with minute elevations and depressions, characteristic of some minerals.—Earthy manganese. See wad.

ear-trumpet (ér'trum'pet), n. An apparatus for collecting sound-waves and conveying them to the ear, used chiefly by the deaf. The most common form is a simple metallic tube having a flaring or bell-shaped mouth for collecting the waves of sound, and a smaller end or ear-piece which is inserted in the ear.

ear-wax (ér'waks), n. Cerumen.

earwig (ér'wig), n. [= E. dial. earwike, ear-wrig, yerriwig, errwiggle, etc., < ME. erwygge, erewygge, yerwygge, < AS. earwiga, also once improp. earwiga, earwig (translating L. biatta), < édre, ear, + wiga, a rare word, occurring but once (Leechdoms, ii. 134, l. 4, translated 'ear-wig'), appar. a general term for an insect, lit. a moving creature, allied to wig, a horse, wiht, a creature, a wight, < wegan, tr. bear, carry, intr. move, > E. weigh: see wight, wight.—Many languages give a name to this insect indicating a belief that it is prone to creep into the human ear: D. oorworm = G. ohrwurm, ear-worm; G. ohrböhrer, 'ear-borer'; Sw. örmask, 'ear-worm'; Dan. örentvist, 'ear-twister'; F. perce-oreille, Pg. fura-orelhas, 'pierce-ear'; Sp. gusano del oído, It. verme auricolare, 'ear-worm', etc.] 1. The popular English name of all the cursorial orthopterous insects of the family Forficulidae, representing the sub-order Euplexoptera, which has several genera and numerous species. There is a popular notion that these insects creep into the ear and cause injury to it. They are mostly nocturnal and phytophagous, though some are carnivorous. They have filiform, many-jointed antennae, short, veinless, leathery upper wings, under wings folded both lengthwise and crosswise, anal forceps, and no ocelli. The common earwig is Forficula auricularis; the great earwig is Labidura gigantea; the little earwig is Labia minor. Another species is Spongophora brunneipennis.

2. In the United States, the common name of any of the small centipeds, such as are found in houses in most of the States.—3†. One who gains the ear of another by stealth and whispers insinuations; a prying informer; a whisperer.

That gaudy earwig, or my lord your patron, Whose pensioner you are. Ford, Broken Heart, II. 1.

Ear-wigs that buzz what they think fit in the retin'd closet. Bp. Hacket, Life of Abp. Williams, I. 85.

earwig (ér'wig), v. t.; pret. and pp. earwigged, pp. earwigging. [earwig, n.] To gain the ear of and influence by covert statements or insinuations; whisper insinuations in the ear of against another; fill the mind of with prejudice by covert statements.

He was so sure to be earwigged in private that what he heard or said openly went for little. Marryat, Snarleywow.

Up early and down late, for he was nothing of a slug-gard; daily ear-wigging influential men, for he was a master of ingratitude. R. L. Stevenson, A College Magazine, II.

ear-witness (ér'wit'nes), n. 1. One who is able to give testimony to a fact from his own hearing.

An ear-witness of all the passages betwixt them. Fuller. Dante is the eye-witness and ear-witness of that which he relates. Macaulay, Milton.

2. A mediate witness; one who testifies to what he has received upon the testimony of others. Hamilton.

ear-worm (ér'wërm), n. 1. Same as boil-worm.—2†. A secret counselor.

There is nothing in the oath to protect such an ear-worm, but he may be appeached. Bp. Hacket, Life of Abp. Williams, II. 152.

earwort (ér'wërt), n. The Rhachacathis rupestris, a low rubiaceous shrub of the West Indies. ease (ëz), n. [Early mod. E. also eaze, ese; < ME. ese, eise, eyse, < AF. eise, OF. aise, ayse, aise, F. aise, f., = Pr. aise, ais (< prob. Basque asia) = OCat. aise, ease, = Pg. azo, aid, motive, occasion, = OIt. asio, agio, aggio, m., ease, convenience, exchange, premium, now distinguished in spelling: agio, ease; aggio (> F. agio, > E. agio, q. v.), exchange, premium. Hence the adj., OF. aise, ayse, aise = Fr. ais, easy (mod. F. aise, p. a., easy); the adv. phrase, OF. aïse, F. à l'aise = Pr. ad ais = It. ad agio, adagio (> E. adagio), at ease, at leisure, > OF. aise, ahaise = OPg. aaso = It. adagio, ease; and the compound, F. malaise (> E. malaise), uneasiness. The Rom. forms are somewhat irregular, and are certainly of external origin, perhaps Celtic: cf. (1) Bret. eaz, ez, easy; Gael. adhais, leisure, ease. There is nothing to prove a connection with (2) AS. æðhe, obs. E. æth (see æth); or with (3) Goth. azets, easy (in compar. azetizo), azeti, ease, azetaba, easily; or with (4) L. otium, ease (see otiose); or with (5) OHG. essa, MHG. G. esse (> Dan. esse), a forge, furnace, chimney, orig. a fireplace (akin to AS. ād, a funeral pyre, ast, a furnace, kiln, > E. oast, q. v.), whence, as some conjecture, 'to be at one's ease' (F. être à son aise), orig. 'to be at one's hearth, feel at home'; or with (6) MLG. esse = G. esse = ODan. esse, Dan. es = Sw. esse, well-being, comfort, ease (appar. < L. esse, be, used as a noun): unless indeed these last Teut. forms are, like the E. word, from the F. aise.] 1. An undisturbed state of the body; freedom from labor, pain, or physical annoyance of any kind; tranquil rest; physical comfort: as, he sits at his ease; to take one's ease.

Be comfortable to thy friends, and to thyself with ease.
Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 89.

Soul, . . . take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry.
Luke xii. 19.

How blest is he who crowns, in shades like these,
A youth of labour with an age of ease!
Goldsmith, Des. VII., l. 99.

Better the toil . . .
Than waking dream and slothful ease.
Whittier, Seed-time and Harvest.

2. A quiet state of the mind; freedom from concern, anxiety, solicitude, or anything that frets or ruffles the mind; tranquillity.

And Gonnore hymn praide soome to come a-gein, "for neuer," quod (shel), "shall I be in ease of herte vn to the tyme that I yow se a-gein." Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 360.

Oh, did he light upon you? what, he would have had you seek for ease at the hands of Mr. Legality?

Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 100.
Like a coy maiden, Ease, when courted most,
Farthest retires—an idol, at whose shrine
Who oft nest sacrifice are favor'd least.

Cowper, Task, l. 409.

Hence—3t. Comfort afforded or provided; satisfaction; relief; entertainment; accommodation.

But for the love of God they him bisoght
Of herberwe [harborage] and of ease as for hir peny.
Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, l. 199.

It is an ease to your friends abroad that you are more a man of business than heretofore; for now it were an injury to trouble you with a busy letter.

Donne, Letters, xxxi.

A principal fruit of friendship is the ease and discharge of the fulness of the heart, which passions of all kinds do cause and induce.

Bacon, Friendship (ed. 1887).

It is an ease, Malfato, to disburthen
Our souls of secret clogs.

Ford, Lady's Trial, i. 3.

4. Facility; freedom from difficulty or great labor: as, it can be done with great ease.

When you please, 'tis done with ease.

Robin Hood and the Golden Arrow (Child's Ballads, V. 387).

Lamenting is altogether contrary to rejoycing, every man saith so, and yet is it a piece of ioy to be able to lament with ease.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 37.

The Mob of Gentlemen who wrote with ease.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 108.

5. Freedom from stiffness, constraint, or formality; unaffectedness: as, ease of style; ease of manner.

True ease in writing comes from art, not chance.

Pope, Essay on Criticism, i. 362.

At ease in an undisturbed state: free from pain or anxiety: used also with a qualification of emphasis (well at ease) or of negation (ill at ease, formerly sometimes evil on ease, ME. evle an eyse).

His soul shall dwell at ease.
Ps. xxv. 13.

Ther I was well at ease, for ther was no thyng that I Desyred to have but I had it shortly.

Torkington, Diary of Eng. Travell, p. 7.

I am very ill at ease,

Unfit for mine own purposes.

Shak., Othello, iii. 3.

At one's ease, comfortable; free from stiffness or formality.—Chapel of ease. See chapel.—Little ease, a cell much too small for a prisoner, used as a torture in the reign of Elizabeth.—Syn. 1. Quiet, Tranquillity, etc. See rest.—2. Ease, Easiness, Facility. (See readiness.) In connection with tasks of any sort, ease is subjective, and denotes freedom from labor, or the power of doing things without seeming effort: as, he reads with ease. Easiness is in this connection generally objective, characterizing the nature of the task: as, the easiness of the task led him to despise it. Facility in the objective sense of easiness of performance or accomplishment is nearly obsolete; properly it is subjective, being sometimes equivalent to readiness. Like other powers, facility is partly the result of some special endowment or adaptation, but also is developed by practice.

Whate'er he did was done with so much ease,
In him alone 'twas natural to please.

Dryden, Abs. and Achit., i. 27.

Refrain to-night;
And that shall lend a kind of easiness
To the next abstinence. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4.

He changed his faith and his allegiance two or three times, with a facility that evinced the looseness of his principles.
Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 362.

ease (ēz), v. t.; pret. and pp. eased, ppr. easing. [ME. esen, eisen, < OF. eiser, aisier* = Pr. aisar = Pg. azar = It. agiare, ease; from the noun.] 1. To relieve or free from pain or bodily discomfort or annoyance; give rest or relief to; make comfortable.

Ther thei rested and eased hem [themselves] in the town as thei that ther-to hadde grete nede.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 172.

Heaven, I hope, will ease me: I am sick.

Beau. and Fl., Philaster, iv. 3.

The longer they live the worse they are, and death alone must ease them.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 262.

Thou mayest rejoice in the mansion of rest, because, by thy means, many living persons are eased or advantaged.

Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, iv. 9.

2. To free from anxiety, care, or mental disturbance: as, the late news has eased my mind.

Now first I find

Mine eyes true opening, and my heart much eased.

Milton, P. L., xii. 274.

3. To release from pressure or tension; lessen or moderate the tension, tightness, weight, closeness, speed, etc., of, as by slacking, lifting slightly, shifting a little, etc.: sometimes with off: as, to ease a ship in a seaway by putting down the helm, or by throwing some cargo overboard; to ease a bar or a nut in machinery.

O ease your hand! treat not so hard your slave!

Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, i. 546).

There may be times no doubt when the pressure by Russia upon ourselves in India may be eased off by a dexterous diplomatic use of European alliances and complications.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 7.

4. To relieve, as by the removal of a burden or an encumbrance; remove from, as a burden: with off before the thing removed: as, to ease a porter of his load.

The children hem vn-armed and wente to theire loggyns, and hem eased of all thinge that to manys body belongeth.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 271.

Will no man ease me of this fool?

Beau. and Fl., Laws of Candy, ii. 1.

I'll ease you of that care, and please myself in 't.

Middleton, Chaste Maid, ii. 2.

He was not gone far, after his arrival, but the cavaliers met him and eased him of his money.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 119.

Sir Thomas Smythe, having reluctantly professed a wish to be eased of his office, was dismissed.

Bancroft, Hist. U. S., i. 118.

5. To mitigate; alleviate; assuage; allay; abate or remove in part, as any burden, pain, grief, anxiety, or disturbance.

Sound advice might ease his wearie thoughtes.

Gascoigne, Steele Glas (ed. Arber), p. 52.

Ease thou somewhat the grievous servitude of thy father.

2 Chron. x. 4.

Strong fevers are not eas'd

With counsel, but with best receipts and means.

Ford, Broken Heart, ii. 2.

There . . . may sweet music ease thy pain

Amidst our feast.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 106.

6. To render less difficult; facilitate.

My lords, to ease all this, but hear me speak.

Marlowe, Edward II., i. 2.

High over seas

Flying, and over lands, with mutual wing

Easing their flight.

Milton, P. L., vii. 428.

Ease her! the command given to reduce the speed of a steamer's engine, generally preparatory to the command "stop her," or "turn astern."—To ease away (naut.), to slack gradually, as the fall of a tackle.—To ease the helm. See helm.—Syn. 2. To quiet, calm, tranquilize, still, pacify.—4. To disburden, disencumber.

easyful (ēz'fūl), a. [ease + -ful.] Attended by or affording ease; promoting rest or comfort; quiet; peaceful; restful.

To himself, he doth your gifts apply;

As his main force, choice sport, and easyful stay.

Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, i. 524).

I spy a black, suspicious, threatening cloud,

That will encounter with our glorious sun,

Ere he attain his easyful western bed.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 8.

A high-bred, courtly, chivalrous song; . . . a song for royal parks and groves, and easyful but impassioned life.

The Century, XXVII. 783.

easefully (ēz'fūl-i), adv. With ease or quiet.

easefulness (ēz'fūl-nes), n. The state of being easyful, or the quality of promoting ease and tranquillity.

*easel*¹ (ē'zēl), n. [D. ezel = G. esel, an esel, lit. an ass, = AS. esol, an ass: see ass.] For the particular meaning, 'a support,' cf. clothes-horse, saw-horse, saw-buck, F. chevalet, Sp. caballette, Pg. cavallette de pintor, It. cavalletto, an esael, clothes-horse, etc.] A frame in the form of a tripod for supporting a blackboard, paper, or canvas in drawing and painting; also, a similar frame used as a rest for portfolios, large books, etc.—Easel-picture, easel-piece. (a) A movable picture painted on an esael, as distinguished from a painting on a wall, ceiling, etc. (b) A picture small enough to be placed on an esael for exhibition after completion.

*easel*² (ē'sēl), adv. [Sc., also written esael, eastle, eastilt, appar. variations of eastlin, eastling*, adv., easterly: see eastling. For the form, cf. deasil.] Eastward.

Ow, man! ye should hae hadden esael to Kippeltringan.

Scott, Guy Mannering, l.

easeless (ēz'les), a. [< ease + -less.] Wanting ease; lacking in ease. [Rare.]

Send me some tokens, that my hope may live,

Or that my easeless thoughts may sleep and rest.

Donne, The Tocken.

I easelesse, easelesse pr'd about

In every nook, furious to finde her out.

Vicars, tr. of Virgil (1632).

easement (ēz'mēt), n. [< ME. esement, eyement, < OF. aisement (= Fr. aisimen), < aiser, ease: see ease and ment.] 1. That which gives ease, relief, or assistance; convenience; accommodation.

Thei ben fulle grete Schippes, and faire, and wel ordeyned, and made with Halles and Chambres, and other eyementes as though it were on the Land.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 214.

Here they of force (as fortune now did fall)

Compelled were themselves awhile to rest,

Glad of that easement, though it were but small.

Spenser, F. Q., VI. iv. 15.

He has the advantage of a free lodging, and some other easements.

Swift.

2. In law, a right of accommodation in another's land; such a right in respect to lands—as that of passage, or of having free access of light and air—which does not involve taking anything from the land; more specifically, such a right when held in respect to one piece of land by the owner of a neighboring piece by virtue of his ownership of the latter. In reference to this latter piece, the right is termed an easement; in reference to the former it is termed a servitude: but by some writers these terms are used indiscriminately. Easement, as distinguished from license, implies an interest in the servient tenement itself.

3. In carp., same as ease-off.—Apparent easement, an easement "of such a nature that it may be seen or known on a careful inspection by a person ordinarily conversant with the subject" (L. A. Goodale).

ease-off (ēz'ōf), n. In carp., etc., a curve or easy transition formed at the junction of two pieces, moldings, etc., which would otherwise meet at an angle, as at the junction of the wall-string of a flight of stairs with the base-board of the wall, either above or below.

easily (ē'zēl-i), adv. [< ME. esily, esely, esiliche; < easy + -ly.] In an easy manner; with ease; without difficulty, pain, labor, anxiety, etc.; smoothly; quietly; tranquilly: as, a task easily performed; an event easily foreseen; to pass life easily; the carriage moves easily.

Than meveth on monday two houres be-fore day, and goth all esely oon after a-nother with-oute sore travelle.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 318.

It is but a little abuse, say they, and it may be easily amended.

Latimer, Sermon of the Plough.

Coming to Norwich, he [Prince Lewis] takes that City easily, but Dover cost him a longer Siege.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 72.

Not soon provoked, she easily forgives.

Prior.

easiness (ē'zēn-ēs), n. 1. The state of being easy; the act of imparting or the state of enjoying ease; restfulness: as, the easiness of a vehicle; the easiness of a seat.

I think the reason I have assigned hath a great interest in that rest and easiness we enjoy when asleep.

Ray.

2. Freedom from difficulty; ease of performance or accomplishment: as, the easiness of an undertaking.

Easiness and difficulty are relative terms.

Tillotson.

3. Flexibility; readiness to comply; prompt compliance; a yielding or disposition to yield without opposition or reluctance: as, easiness of temper.

Give to him, and he shall but laugh at your easiness.
South.

This easiness and credulity destroy all the other merit he has; and he has all his life been a sacrifice to others, without ever receiving thanks, or doing one good action.
Steele, Spectator, No. 82.

4. Freedom from stiffness, constraint, effort, or formality: applied to manners or style.

Abstruse and mystic thoughts you must express
With painful care, but seeming easiness.
Roscommon, On Translated Verse.

That which cannot without injury be denied to you, is the easiness of your conversation, far from affectation or pride; not denying even to enemies their just praises.
Dryden, Ded. of Third Misc.

She had not much company of her own sex, except those whom she most loved for their easiness, or esteemed for their good sense.
Swift, Death of Stella.

=Syn. 2. Facility, etc. See ease.

easing† (ē'zing), n. [‹ ease + -ing†.] An easement; an allowance; a special privilege.

One of the four cardinal points of the compass, opposite to the west, and lying on the right hand when one faces the north; the point in the heavens where the sun is seen to rise at the equinox, or the corresponding point on the earth. Strictly, the term applies to the one point where the sun rises at the equinox; but originally and in general use it refers to the general direction. Specifically (eccles.), the point of the compass toward which one is turned when facing the altar or high altar from the direction of the nave. As early as the second century it was the established custom for Christians to pray facing the east. From this resulted the custom of building churches with the altar and sanctuary at the east end and the main entrance at the west end, and of using the terms in this way even with respect to churches not so built.

In comynge down fro the Mount of Olyvete, toward the Est, is a Castelle, that is cleped Bethanye.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 97.

Here lies the east: Doth not the day break here?
Shak., J. C., ii. 1.

2. The quarter or direction toward the mean point of sunrise; an eastward situation or trend; the eastern part or side: as, a town or country in the east of Europe, or on the east of a range of mountains; to travel to the east (that is, in an eastern direction).—3. A territory or region situated eastward of the person speaking, or of the people using the term. Specifically—(a) [cap.] The parts of Asia collectively (as lying east of Europe) where civilization has existed from early times, including Asia Minor, Syria, Arabia, India, China, etc.; as, the riches of the East; the spices and perfumes of the East; the kings of the East. Also called the Orient.

The gorgeous east, with richest hand,
Showers on her kings Barbaric pearl and gold.
Milton, F. L., ii. 3.

(b) In the Bible, the countries southeast, east, and northeast of Palestine, as Moab, Ammon, Arabia Deserta, Armenia, Assyria, Babylon, Parthia. The countries designated by the term in particular passages must be discovered from the context.

Then Jacob went on his journey, and came into the land of the people of the east.

Easter¹ (ēs'tēr), n. and a. [‹ ME. ester, earlier aster, ester, also esterne, esterne (orig. pl.), ‹ AS. eastre, generally pl., nom. eastro, gen. eastre, dat. eastron, eastron, also eastor-, eastor-

(only in comp. and in ONorth. gen. eastres), Easter, = OHG. ostara, pl. ostarin, MHG. oster, generally pl. ostern, G. ostern (in comp. oster-), Easter; orig. a festival in honor of the goddess of Spring, = AS. Eāstra*, whose name as such is given by Bede in the dial. form Eōstra = OHG. Ostarā*, etc.: see east, n.] I. n. A festival observed in the Christian church, from early times, in commemoration of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. It corresponds with the Passover of the Jews, which in the King James version of the Bible is called once by the name of Easter (Acts xii. 4). The name appears several times in several versions. Easter is observed by the Greek, Roman Catholic, Episcopal, and Lutheran churches, and by many among the non-liturgical churches who do not generally regard the church year. The esteem in which it is held is indicated by its ancient title, "the great day." Easter is the Sunday which follows that 14th day of the calendar moon which falls upon or next after the 21st day of March. This is true both of old style and new, and the rule has been used, though not universally, from a very early day.

The northern Irish and Scottish, together with the Picts, observed the custom of the Britons, keeping their Easter upon the Sunday that fell between the xiv. and the xx. day of the Moon.

Abp. Ussher, Religion of the Anc. Irish, ix., in Wordsworth's Church of Ireland, p. 64.

Gauss's Rule for finding the date of Easter. First, take x and y out of the following table:

	x	y
Old style.....	15	6
New style, A. D. 1582-1699.....	22	2
" " 1700-1799.....	23	3
" " 1800-1899.....	24	4
" " 1900-2099.....	24	5

Second, calculate the five numbers a, b, c, d, e, by the following rules, where N is the number of the year:

a is the remainder after the division of N by 19.
b is the remainder after the division of N by 4.
c is the remainder after the division of N by 7.
d is the remainder after the division of $19a + x$ by 30.
e is the remainder after the division of $2b + 4c + 6d + y$ by 7.

Third, then $d + e + 23$ is the day of March, or $d + e - 9$ is the day of April on which Easter falls, except that when this rule gives April 26th the true day is April 19th, and when the rule gives April 25th, if $d = 28$ and $a > 10$, then the true day is April 18th.

II. a. Of or pertaining to Easter.

It were much to be wished . . . that their easter devotions would, in some measure, come up to their easter dress.
South, Works, II. viii.

At Easter priced, at a cheap rate, flesh being formerly then at a discount. Wright.—Easter day, the day on which the festival of Easter is celebrated.

Easter eggs, or Pasch eggs, are symbolical of creation, or the re-creation of spring. The practice of presenting eggs to our friends at Easter is Magian or Persian. Christians adopted the custom to symbolize the resurrection, and they color the eggs red in allusion to the blood of their redemption.
Brewer.

Easter eve (sometimes Easter even), the day before Easter Sunday; Holy Saturday; the end of Lent and the prelude to the festival of Easter. In the early church Good Friday and Easter eve were observed as a strict and continuous fast till after midnight of the latter, the whole night before Easter day being passed in continual worship and in listening to lectures and sermons. During this vigil the churches, and frequently the streets, were brilliantly lighted, the worshippers also bringing lamps and tapers with them. Two ancient ceremonies of Easter eve, still retained in the Roman Catholic Church, are the benediction of the paschal taper (see paschal and exultet), a custom which is said to have originated in the fifth century, and the benediction of the font. Easter eve was the chief time for baptism in the early church.

And soo to Roane the same nyght, where we abode ebb-tide (eb'tid), n. The reflux of tide-water; the retiring tide.

ebent, n. An obsolete form of ebon. Johnson. Ebenaceæ (eb-ê-nâ'sê-ê), n. pl. [NL., < L. ebenus (see ebony) + -aceæ.] A natural order of gamopetalous exogens, containing 5 or 6 genera and about 250 species, shrubs or trees, chiefly inhabiting the tropics, with hard and heavy wood. Among the valuable timbers yielded by this order are the ebony, calamander-wood, marblewood, etc. The largest and most important genus is Diospyros. See out under Diospyros.

ebenet, n. An obsolete form of ebon.

ebeneous (ê-bê-nê-us), a. [< LL. ebeneus, of ebony, < L. ebenus, ebony: see ebony.] Of or pertaining to ebony; black; ebony-colored.

Ebionism (ê'bi-on-izm), n. Same as Ebionitism.

But an Ebionism which Ireneus and Eusebius, who had the entire works of these authors in their hands, failed to detect, could not be of a very pronounced character. G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 502.

Ebionite (ê'bi-on-it), n. and a. [< LL. Ebionite, pl., Gr. Ἐβωναῖται, < Heb. ebjônîm (pl. of ebjôn), lit. 'the poor'; the origin of the application of the name is uncertain.] I. n.

A member of a party of Judaizing Christians which appeared in the church as early as the second century and disappeared about the fourth century. They agreed in (1) the recognition of Jesus as the Messiah, (2) the denial of his divinity, (3) belief in the universal obligation of the Mosaic law, and (4) rejection of Paul and his writings. The two great divisions of Ebionites were the Pharisaic Ebionites, who emphasized the obligation of the Mosaic law, and the Essenic Ebionites, who were more speculative and leaned toward Gnosticism.

II. a. Relating to the heresy of the Ebionites. Ebionitic (ê'bi-on-it'ik), a. [< Ebionite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Ebionites or Ebionitism. Ebionitism (ê'bi-on-it-izm), n. [< Ebionite + -ism.] The doctrines or system of the Ebionites. Also Ebionism.

The principal monument of the Essenic Ebionitism is the pseudo-Clementine writings, whose date is somewhere in the latter part of the second century.

G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 499.

ebalanin (eb'la-nin), n. [Formation not clear.] Same as pyroloxanthine.

Eblis, Iblēs (eb'lis, ib'lēs), n. [Ar. Iblīs.] In Mohammedan myth., an evil spirit or devil, the chief of the fallen angels or wicked jinn.

Before his fall he was called Azazel or Hharis. —Hall of Eblis, the hall of demons; pandemonium.

ebœe-light (ê'bô-lit), n. [< ebœe, appar. W. Ind., + light.] The Erythroxylon brevipes, a shrub of the West Indies.

ebœe-torchwood (ê'bô-tôrch'wûd), n. Same as ebœe-light.

ebœe-tree (ê'bô-trê), n. A leguminous tree, Dipteryx oleifera, of the Mosquito Coast in Central America, the seeds of which yield a large quantity of oil. They resemble the tonquin-bean, but are entirely without fragrance.

ebon (eb'on), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also eben, heben, ebene, etc. (cf. D. ebenholt = G. ebenholtz (> Dan. ibenholt = Sw. ebenholts), 'ebony-wood', < OF. benus, ebene, F. ébène = Pr. ebena = Sp. Pg. It. ebano, < L. ebenus, corruptly hebenus, < Gr. ἐβένος, ἐβένυ, the ebony-tree, ebony, prob. of Phen. origin; cf. Heb. hobnîm, pl., ebony: so called in allusion to its hardness; < eben, a stone. Now usually ebony, ebon being chiefly poetical: see ebony.] I. n. Ebony (which see).

To write those plagues that then were coming on Doth ask a pen of ebon and the night. Drayton, Barons' Wars, iv.

Of all those trees that be appropriate to India, Virgil hath highly commended the ebene above the rest.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xii. 4.

II. a. 1. Consisting of or made of ebony.

A gentle youth, his dearly loved Squire, His speare of heben wood behind him bare. Spenser, F. Q., I. vii. 87.

2. Like ebony in color; dark; black.

Heaven's ebon vault, Studded with stars unutterably bright, Through which the moon's unclouded grandeur rolls. Shelley, Queen Mab, iv.

Sappho, with that gloriolè Of ebon hair on calmed brows. Mrs. Browning, Vision of Poets.

ebonist (eb'on-ist), n. [< ebon, ebony, + -ist.] A worker in ebony.

ebonite (eb'on-it), n. [< ebon, ebony, + -ite.] A black, hardened compound of caoutchouc or gutta-percha and sulphur in different proportions, to which other ingredients may be added for specific uses; properly, black vulcanite, but used also as a general synonym of vulcanite (which see).

ebonize (eb'on-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. ebonized, ppr. ebonizing. [< ebon, ebony, + -ize.] 1. To stain black, as wood, with a view to the imitation of natural ebony: as, a bookcase of ebonized wood.—2. To make black or tawny; tinge with the color of ebony: as, to ebonize the fairest complexion.

Also spelled ebonise.

ebony (eb'on-i), n. and a. [Early mod. E. ebonie, ibonie: an extended form of ebon, q. v.] I. n.; pl. ebonies (-iz). A name given to various woods distinguished in general by their dark color and hardness, and extensively used for carving, ornamental cabinet-work, instruments, canes, etc. The most valuable is the heart-wood of Diospyros Ebenum, which grows in great abundance in the flat parts of Ceylon, and is of such size that logs of its heart-wood 2 feet in diameter and from 10 to 15 feet long are easily procured. Other varieties of valuable ebony are obtained from D. Ebenaster of the East Indies and D. melanoxylon of the Comorand coast in Hindustan. The most usual color is black, but the ebones from tropical America vary much in this respect. The green ebony of Jamaica, known also as American or West Indian ebony, the wood of a leguminous tree, Brya Ebenus, takes a beautiful polish, and is used for inlaying, making flutes, etc. The brown ebony of British Guiana, the source of which is uncertain, is dark-brown, often with lighter streaks, very hard, and one of the handsomest woods of that country. The green or yellow ebony of French Guiana, the wood of Bignonia Leucosylon, and the red ebony from the same region, are also very hard and heavy. Mountain ebony, of the East Indies, is the wood of Bauhinia variegata.

Our captain counts the image of God, nevertheless the image, cut in ebony, as if done in ivory.

Fuller, Good Sea-Captain.

Spark! d'his [the swan's] jetty eyes; his feet did show
Beneath the waves like Africa's ebony.

Keats, Imit. of Spenser.

II. a. Of ebony; made of ebony, or like ebony: as, an ebony cane; an ebony finish.

éboulement (F. pron. ä-böl'mon), n. [F., < ébouler, tumble down, < é (< L. ex-), out of, down, + bouler, < boule, bowl, ball: see *bowl*².]

1. In fort., the crumbling or falling of the wall of a fortification.—2. In geol., a land-slide, or land-slip; an avalanche of rock; the giving way and sudden fall of a mass of rock, earth, or loose material of any kind. Sometimes, though rarely, used by writers in English, as, for instance, in describing the phenomena of earthquakes and volcanoes.

ebracteate, ebracteated (ë-brak'të-ät, -ä-ted), a. [< L. e- priv. + bractea, a thin plate: see bracteate.] In bot., without bracts.

When bracts are absent altogether, as is usually the case in the plants of the natural order Cruciferae, . . . such plants are said to be ebracteated.

R. Bentley, Botany, p. 181.

ebracteolate (ë-brak'të-ö-lät), a. [< L. e- priv. + bracteola, dim. of bractea, a thin plate: see bracteolate.] In bot., without bractlets.

Ebraiket, a. A Middle English form of Hebraic.

Ebrewit, n. An obsolete form of Hebrew.

ebriety (ë-bri'e-ti), n. [Formerly ebrietie; < F. ebriété = Pr. ebriat = Sp. ebriedad = Pg. ebriedade = It. ebrieta, ebbrieta, < L. ebrieta (-s), drunkenness, < ebrius, drunken: see ebrius.] Drunkenness; intoxication by spirituous liquors; derangement of the mental functions caused by drink. [Now rare.]

Bitter almonds, . . . [as an] antidote against ebriety, hath commonly failed. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 6.

We have a very common expression to describe a man in a state of ebriety, that "he is as drunk as a beast," or that "he is beastly drunk." I. D'Israeli, Curios. of Lit., III. 32.

ébrillade (F. pron. ä-brë-lyäd'), n. [F., < It. sbrieglata, a pull of the bridle, check, reproof, < sbrieglare, unbridle, undo, loosen, < s- (< L. ex-), out, + briglia, bridle.] In the manege, a check given to a horse by a sudden jerk of one rein when he refuses to turn.

ebriosity (ë-bri-ös'i-ti), n. [Formerly ebriositie; = F. ébriosité, < L. ebriositas (-s), < ebriosus, given to drink, < ebrius, drunken: see ebrius.] Habitual drunkenness. [Rare.]

That religion which excuseth . . . Noah in the aged surprisal of six hundred years . . . will neither acquit ebriosity nor ebriety in their known and intended perversions.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 21.

Of all ebriosity, who does not prefer to be intoxicated by the air he breathes?

Thoreau, Walden, p. 234.

ebrius (ë-bri-us), a. [= F. ébrieux = Sp. ebrioso = It. ebrioso, ebbrioso, < L. ebrius, drunken; drunk; intoxicated. [Rare.]

ebuccinator (ë-buk'si-nä-tör), n. [< L. e-, out, + buccinator, prop. bucinator, a trumpeter: see buccinator.] A trumpeter. [Rare.]

The ebuccinator, shewer, and declarer of these news, I have made Gabriel, the angel and ambassador of God.

Becon, Works, I. 43.

ebulliate (ë-bul'yät), v. i. [Improp. for ebulate*, < L. ebullatus, pp. of ebullare, for the more correct L. ebullire, boil up: see ebullient.] To boil or bubble up; effervesce.

Whence this 29 play-oppugning argument will ebulliate.

Prynne, Histrio-Mastix, I. iv. 3.

ebullience, ebullient (ë-bul'yens, -yën-si), n. [< ebullire: see ence, ency.] A boiling over; a bursting forth; overflow.

The natural and enthusiastic fervour of men's spirits, and the ebullience of their fancy. Cudworth, Sermons, p. 93.

The absence of restraints—of severe conditions—in fine art allows a flush and ebullience, an opulence of production, that is often called the highest genius.

A. Bain, Corr. of Forces.

ebullient (ë-bul'yent), a. [< L. ebullient (-s), ppr. of ebullire, boil out or up, < e, out, + bullire, boil: see *boil*², v.] Boiling over, as a liquid; overflowing; hence, over-enthusiastic; over-demonstrative.

The ebullient choler of his refractory and pertinacious disciple.

Landor.

That the so ebullient enthusiasm of the French was in this case perfectly well directed, we cannot undertake to say.

Carlyle.

Those ebullient years of my adolescence.

Lovell, The Century, XXXV. 511.

Mr. Brookfield presents an amusing type of a prolix and ebullient old actor.

Athenaeum, Jan. 14, 1888, p. 60.

ebullioscope (ë-bul'yö-sköp), n. [= F. ebullioscope, irreg. < L. ebullire, boil up, + Gr. σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument by which the strength of spirit of wine is determined by the careful determination of its boiling-point.

ebullition (ëb-u-lish'on), n. [= OF. ebullicion, F. ebullition = Pr. ebulicio = Sp. ebulicion, ebulicion = Pg. ebulição = It. ebullizione, < LL. ebullitio (-n), < L. ebullire, boil up: see ebullient.]

1. The bubbling up or agitation which results from the action of heat on a liquid, owing to the lowest portions becoming gaseous and escaping; a boiling up or over. The temperature at which ebullition takes place varies with the liquid, and when performed in the open air with the pressure of the atmosphere, being higher when the pressure is increased, and lower when it is diminished. See boiling-point.

It is possible to heat water 20° F. above its boiling-point without ebullition.

Clerk Maxwell, Heat, p. 25.

2. Any similar agitation, bubbling up, or disturbed or seething condition or appearance, produced by causes other than heat, as when rapidly flowing water encounters numerous obstacles or contrary currents.

The chafing of the water against these huge obstacles [rocks of granite], the meeting of the contrary currents one with another, creates such a violent ebullition, . . . that it fills the mind with confusion.

Bruce, Source of the Nile, I. 156.

3. Effervescence occasioned by fermentation or by any other process which causes the evolution of an aeriform fluid, as in the mixture of an acid with a carbonated alkali. [In this sense formerly bullition.]

We cannot find it to hold neither in iron or copper, which is dissolved with less ebullition.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 7.

4. Figuratively, an outward display of feeling; a sudden burst; a pouring forth; an overflowing: as, an ebullition of passion.

The greatest ebullitions of the imagination. Johnson.

Disposed to refer this to inexperience, or the ebullition of youthful spirit.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 3.

It was not an extravagant ebullition of feeling, but might have been calculated on by any one acquainted with the spirits of our community.

Emerson, Hist. Discourse at Concord.

=Syn. Ebullition, Effervescence, Fermentation. Ebullition is a boiling out or up; the word may be applied figuratively to that which suggests heated or intense activity. Effervescence is not the result of heat or of the escape of steam, but of the escape of gas from a liquid. Fermentation is a process often invisible, often taking place in solids, and sometimes producing effervescence in liquids.

ebulum, ebulus (ëb'ü-lum, -lus), n. [L.] The herb wall-wort, danewort, or dwarf elder.

E. Phillips, 1706.

Eburia (ë-bü-ri-ä), n. [NL. (Serville, 1834), < L. ebur, ivory: see ivory.] A genus of longicorn beetles, of the family Cerambycidae, comprising many species, mostly of Central and South America and the West Indies. Ten, however, are found in North America, as the common E. quadrigemina.

eburine (ëb'ü-rin), n. [< L. ebur, ivory (see ivory), + *-ine*².] An artificial ivory composed of bone-dust, gum tragacanth, and some coloring substance.

eburite (ëb'ü-rīt), n. [< L. ebur, ivory, + *-ite*².] Same as eburine.

Eburna (ë-bër-nä), n. [NL., fem. of L. eburnus, of ivory, < ebur, ivory: see ivory.] A genus of gastropods, variously limited. (a) By Lamarck it was made to include the ivory-shell E. glabrata, as well as turreted species of the family Buccinidae. (b) By most later writers the typical species has been referred to the Olividae and the genus restricted to buccinids, like E. spirata, which are by others designated as the genus Latrunidus. As thus limited, it is remarkable for the oblong-ovate form, turreted spire, and flattish upper or sutural surface of the whorls, deep umbilicus, and thick porcellaneous texture. The color is also characteristic, reddish spots being distributed on a white ground. (c) By a few the genus is restricted to the ivory-shell E. glabrata, by others called Dipacrus. There are about 14 species, found in China, etc.; some are used for food.

Ivory-shell (Eburna spirata).

Eburia quadrigemina, natural size.

eburnated (ë-bër-nä-ted), a. [< L. eburnus, of ivory, + *-atē*¹ + *-ed*².] Made hard and dense, like ivory: said of bone.

eburnation (ëb-ër-nä'shon), n. [= F. éburnation; < L. eburnus, of ivory, + -ation.] In pathol., a morbid change in bone by which it becomes very hard and dense, like ivory, as in arthritis deformans.

eburnean (ëb-ër-nē-an), a. [= F. éburnéen, < L. eburnus, of ivory: see eburneous.] Relating to or made of ivory.

eburneous (ëb-ër-nē-us), a. [= Sp. eburneo = Pg. eburneo = It. eburneo, eburno, < L. eburneus, of ivory, < ebur, ivory: see ivory.] Resembling ivory in color; of ivory-like whiteness: as, the eburneous gull, Larus eburnus.

eburnification (ë-bër'ni-fi-kä'shon), n. [< eburnify*, < L. eburnus, of ivory, + -ficare, E. -fy, make: see -ation.] The conversion of substances into others which have the appearance or density of ivory.

Eburnineæ (ëb-ër-ni-nē), n. pl. [NL. (Swainson, 1840), < Eburna + -inæ.] A subfamily of gastropods, typified by the genus Eburna, and to which have been also referred genera now known to be little related to it. See cut under Eburna.

eburnine (ëb'ër-nin or -nin), a. [= F. éburnin, < L. eburnus, of ivory, < ebur, ivory: see ivory.] Made of ivory. [Rare.]

All in her night-robe loose, she lay reclined,
And, pensive, read from tablet eburnine.

Scott, L. of L. M., vi. 19.

ec- [L., etc., ec-, < Gr. ἐκ, ék, reg. form before a consonant of ἐξ, ëx, out, etc.: see ex-.] A prefix of Greek origin, the form of ex- before a consonant, as in ec-lipse, ec-logue, ec-stasy, etc. It is sometimes used in scientific terms as equivalent to ecto- or exo-, as opposed to en-, endo-, or ento-.

écaille-work (ä-käl'y'wërk), n. [< F. écaille, = It. scaglia (< G. schale, scale) (see *scale*¹), + E. work.] Decorative work made by sewing scales cut from quills upon a foundation, as of velvet or silk, forming patterns in relief. When skillfully done it resembles mother-of-pearl work.

ecalcarate (ë-kal'kä-rät), a. [< NL. ecalcaratus*, < L. e- priv. + calcar, a spur: see calcarate.] In zool. and bot., having no spur or calcar, in any technical sense of the latter word.

Ecanina (ë-ka-ni'nä), n. pl. [< L. e- priv. + caninus, canine (tooth).] In Blyth's classification of Mammalia, a term proposed as a substitute for the Insectivora of Cuvier.

ecardinal (ë-kär'di-näl), a. [< NL. ecardinalis*, < L. e- priv. + cardo (cardin-), hinge: see cardinal.] Hingeless, inarticulate, or lypomatous, as a brachiopod; of or pertaining to the Ecardines.

Ecardines (ë-kär'di-nēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. e- priv. + cardo (cardin-), a hinge.] One of the two orders of the class Brachiopoda. It includes those brachiopods the bivalve shell of which has no hinge and little if any difference between the dorsal and ventral valves, and contains the families Lingulidae, Discinidae, and Cranidae, which are thus collectively distinguished from the Testicardines. The term is synonymous with Lyopomata, Inarticulata, Pleurogygia, and Sarcobranchiata, all of which are names of this division of brachiopods.

Ecardinia (ë-kär-din'i-ä), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Ecardines.

ecarinate (ë-kär'i-nät), a. [< NL. ecarinatus*, < L. e- priv. + carina, keel: see carinate.] In ornith. and bot., without a carina or keel.

écarté (ä-kär-tä'), n. [F., lit. discarded, pp. of écarter, discard, set aside, < é, < L. ex, out, + carte, card: see *card*¹ and écart.] A game played by two persons with thirty-two cards, the small cards from two to six inclusive being excluded. The players having cut for the deal, which is decided by the highest card, the dealer gives five cards to each player, three and two at a time, and turns up the eleventh card for trump. If he turns up a king, he scores one; and if the king of trumps occurs in the hand of either player, the holder may score one by announcing it before playing. The cards rank as follows: king (highest), queen, knave, ace, ten, etc. A player having a higher card of the suit led must take the trick with such a card; if he cannot follow suit, he may play a trump or not, as he chooses. Three tricks count one point, five tricks (called a vole) two points, and five points make game. Before play begins the non-dealer may propose—that is, claim the right to discard (écarter) any of the cards in his hand, and have them replaced with fresh ones from the pack. Should he do so, both can discard as many cards as they choose.

Ecaudata (ë-kä-dä'tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of ecaudatus: see ecaudate.] In herpet., the Amura or tailless batrachians; opposed to Caudata or Urodela.

ecaudate (ē-kā'dāt), a. [< NL. ecaudatus, < L. e- priv. + cauda, a tail: see caudate.] 1. In bot., without a tail or tail-like appendage. —2. In zool., tailless; anurous; not caudate. Specifically, in entomology, said of the posterior wings of butterflies, etc., when they are destitute of tail-like marginal processes.

Ecballium (ek-bal'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκβάλλειν, throw out, < ἐκ, out, + βάλλειν, throw.] A genus of eucurbitaceous plants, closely allied to Momordica. The only species, E. Elaterium, is the squirting cucumber, a native of southern Europe: so named because the fruit when ripe separates suddenly from its stalk, and at the same moment forcibly expels the seeds and juice from the aperture left at the base. A precipitate obtained from the juice is the elaterium of medicine, a very powerful hydragogue cathartic. See elaterium.

ecbasis (ek'bā-sis), n. [= F. ecbase, < L. ecbasis, < Gr. ἐκβάσις, a going out, issue, event, < ἐκβαίνειν, go out, come out, happen, < ἐκ, out, + βαίνειν, go, = E. come: see base, basis.] An argument drawn from the relation of cause and effect; especially, an argument for or against a certain course of action, such as the passage of a proposed bill or law, from a consideration of probable consequences.

ecbatic (ek-bat'ik), a. [< Gr. as if *ἐκβατικός, < ἐκβαίνειν, happen; see ecbasis.] Relating to an event that has happened; denoting a mere result or consequence, as distinguished from telic, which implies purpose or intention. Thus, the sentence "Events fell out so that the prophecy was fulfilled" is ecbatic; but the sentence "Events were arranged in order that the prophecy might be fulfilled" is telic.

echlasis (ek-blas-tē'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκβλάστησις, a shooting or budding forth, < ἐκβλάσσειν, shoot or sprout out, < ἐκ, out, + βλάσσειν, sprout.] In bot., axillary proliferation in the flower: a term applied by Engelmann to the occurrence of adventitious buds in the axils of one or more parts of the flower.

ecbole (ek'bō-lē), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκβολή, a throwing out (ἐκβολή λόγος, a digression), < ἐκβάλλειν, throw out: see Ecballium.] 1. In rhet., a digression. —2. In Gr. music, the raising or sharpening of a tone: opposed to eclysis.

ecbolic (ek-bol'ik), a. and n. [= F. ecbolique, < Gr. ἐκβολικόν, sc. φάρμακον, a drug for expelling the fetus, < ἐκβάλλειν, throw out: see ecbole.] 1. a. Promoting parturition; producing abortion.

II. n. A drug promoting parturition.

ecce homo (ek'sē hō'mō), [L.: ecce, a demonstrative adv. or interj., here (he or it is)! lo! behold! prob. orig. eco*, < e*, locative of pron. i-s, e-a, i-d, this, he, she, it, + demonstrative suffix -eo; homo: see Homo.] Behold, the man: a phrase commonly used to denote Christ crowned with thorns, considered as a subject for a work of painting or sculpture, from the words with which he was presented by Pilate to the Jews (John xix. 5). This subject has been frequently chosen by artists since the fifteenth century, among its most celebrated examples being paintings by Correggio, Titian, H. Caracci, Guido Reni, Van Dyck, and Guercino.

ecceity (ek-sē'i-ti), n. [< ML. ecceitas (occurring in the 16th century as a modification of the earlier hæccitas, due to the fact that the formation of the latter word was not understood), < L. ecce, lo! in LL. and ML. an assistant pron. or adv., this, here: see ecce homo.] Same as hæccity.

eccentric (ek-sen'trik), a. and n. [Formerly also eccentrick; = F. excentrique = Pr. excen- tric = Sp. excentrico = Pg. excentrico = It. eccentrico = D. excentrick (cf. D. excentrisch = G. excentrisch = Dan. Sw. excentrisk), < NL. eccentricus, < L.L. eccentros, < Gr. ἐκκεντρος, out of the center, < ἐκ, out, + κέντρον, center: see center.] 1. a. 1. Not located or situated in the center; away from the center or axis: as, in botany, lateral embryos and the stipes of some hymenomycetous fungi are said to be eccentric.

The astronomers discover in the earth no centre of the universe, but an eccentric speck.

Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 16.

A complete neural circulation, however, is by no means the necessary condition of a sensibility independently located in eccentric portions of the human body such as Mr. Lewes supposes. G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 234.

2. In med., not originating or existing in the center or central parts; due to peripheral causes: as, eccentric irritation; eccentric convulsions (that is, convulsions due to peripheral irritation). —3. Not coincident as regards center; specifically, in geom., not having the same center: applied to circles and spheres which have not the same center, and consequently are not parallel: opposed to concentric, having a common center. Hence —4. Not coincident as regards course or aim; tending to a different end or result; devious.

Whateoever affairs pass such a man's hands, he crooketh them to his own ends, which must needs be often eccentric to the ends of his master or State.

Bacon, Wisdom for a Man's Self (ed. 1887).

Women's Affections are eccentric to common Apprehension; whereof the two poles are Passion and Inconstancy. Baker, Chronicles, p. 226.

5. Deviating, or characterized by deviation, from recognized, stated, or usual methods or practice, or from established forms, laws, etc.; irregular; erratic; odd: as, eccentric conduct; an eccentric person.

Still he preserves the character of a humorist, and finds most pleasure in eccentric virtuosity.

Goldsmith, Vicar, iii.

So would I bridle thy eccentric soul,

In reason's sober orbit bid it roll.

Whitehead, On Churchill.

6. Of or pertaining to an eccentric: as, the eccentric anomaly of a planet; the eccentric rod of a steam-engine.

In senses 3 and 6 sometimes written excentric.

Eccentric angle, in geom., an angle connected with an ellipse and defined as follows: Let ABDE be an ellipse. Upon the transverse axis AB as a diameter erect the circle ABFG. Then, taking any point on the ellipse, as H, let fall the perpendicular HK upon the transverse axis AB, and continue this perpendicular until it cuts the circle at the point L on the same side of the transverse axis AB. Join L with the common center, C, of the ellipse and circle. Then, the angle BCL, reckoned from one determinate end, B, of the transverse axis, is called the eccentric angle of the point H. The expression is derived from eccentric anomaly. — Eccentric anomaly, See anomaly. — Eccentric cam, a circular disk used as a cam, in which the center of rotation is outside the center of figure. — Eccentric chuck. See chuck. — Eccentric circle. Same as II. 1. — Eccentric cutter. See cutter. — Eccentric equation. Same as equation of the eccentric (which see, under equation). — Eccentric equator. Same as equant.

— Eccentric hypertrophy of the heart. See hypertrophy. — Eccentric place of a planet, its place as seen from the center of its orbit. — Eccentric theory, a theory of the sun's motion which uses an eccentric in place of an epicycle. — Eccentric wheel, a wheel which is fixed on an axis that does not pass through the center. Its action is that of a crank of the same length as the eccentricity. See II. 2. — Syn. 5. Eccentric, Singular, Strange, Odd, Queer, Whimsical, peculiar, erratic. Eccentric is applied to acts which are the effects of tastes, prejudices, judgments, etc., not merely different from those of ordinary people, but largely unaccountable and often irregular, or to the person who thus acts. Singular implies that a thing stands alone in its kind or approximately so; practically, the word expresses some disapprobation: as, a singular fellow or performance; while eccentric people are generally the objects of good-humored interest. Strange implies that the thing or its cause is unknown: as, a very strange proceeding; a strange insect; but what is strange to one man may not be so to another: what is strange to most or all is singular. Odd, unmated, starts from the same idea as singular; when applied to personal appearance, it implies singularity and grotesqueness: as, an odd figure; when applied to the mind or habits, it is nearly equivalent to eccentric, but is somewhat stronger: as, he is very odd; he has odd ways; when applied to actions or conditions, it frequently implies some degree of wonder, and is then nearly the same as surprising: as, it is odd that he does not write. Queer often expresses a singularity that is droll. Whimsical is nearer to eccentric, applying to one who often acts upon capricious and irregular fancies of a rather amusing kind. For connection with quaint, see ancient. See also wonderful, irregular, jaunty.

Eccentric Angle.

Yet in all these scores [of Shakspeare's characters] hardly one . . . is to be found which deviates widely from the common standard, and which we should call very eccentric if we met it in real life. Macaulay, Madame D'Arbly.

The vulgar truth through imitation err;

As oft the learn'd b'y being singular.

Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 425.

Strange graces still, and stranger flights she had,

Was just not ugly, and was just not mad.

Pope, Moral Essays, il. 49.

What can be odder, for example, than the mixture of sensibility and sausages in some of Goethe's earlier notes to Frau von Stein, unless, to be sure, the publishing of them? Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 296.

But the old three-cornered hat,

And the breeches, and all that,

Are so queer.

O. W. Holmes, The Last Leaf.

Birds frequently perish from sudden changes in our whimsical spring weather, of which they have no foreboding. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 6.

II. n. 1. (a) In anc. astron., a circle having its center remote from the earth and carrying an epicycle which in its turn was supposed to carry a planet.

Or if they list to try

Conjecture, he his fabric of the heavens

Hath left to their disputes; perhaps to move

His laughter at their quaint opinions wide

Hereafter, when they come to model heaven

And calculate the stars; how they will wield

The mighty frame; how build, unbuild, contrive,

To save appearances; how gird the sphere

With centric and eccentric scribbled o'er.

Cycle and epicycle, orb in orb. Milton, P. L., viii. 83.

(b) In mod. astron., a circle described about the center of an elliptical orbit, with half the major axis for radius. —2. In mech., a device for converting a regular circular motion into an irregular reciprocating rectilinear motion. It acts upon the body moved by it through its perimeter like a cam, with which it is sometimes classed; but all its peculiarities of motion are essentially those of a crank-motion, and it may be considered as a crank having a wrist of larger diameter than the throw. In the steam-engine it is a disk fitted to the shaft, with its center placed at one side of the center of the shaft, and it acts to convert the rotary motion of the shaft into the reciprocating motion of the valve-gear of the cylinder, and thus to make the engine self-acting. (See link-motion, reversing-gear, and cut-off.) In this sense sometimes written excentric.

3. One who or that which is irregular or anomalous in action; a person of eccentric habits.

Mr. Farquhar added another to his gallery of middle-aged eccentrics. Athenæum, Jan. 14, 1883, p. 60.

Angular advance of an eccentric. See angular. — Eccentric of the eccentric, a circle whose center is remote from the earth (in the Ptolemaic theory) or from the sun (in the Copernican), and which carries round its circumference a second circle, called the eccentric, and this again a third, called the epicycle, which carries a planet. An eccentric of an eccentric was supposed by Ptolemy to explain the motion of Mercury, and by Copernicus to explain the motions of Mercury and Venus. Tycho suggested such an explanation for the motions of Mars. — Equation of the eccentric. See equation.

eccentrical (ek-sen'tri-kal), a. Same as eccentric.

eccentrically (ek-sen'tri-kal-i), adv. With eccentricity; in an eccentric manner or position. Also eccentrically.

Swift, Rab'lais, and that favourite child,

Who, less eccentrically wild,

Inverts the misanthropic plan,

And, hating vices, hates not man.

Lloyd, Familiar Epistle.

eccentric-gear (ek-sen'trik-gēr), n. In mech., a term including all the links and other parts which transmit the motion of an eccentric.

eccentric-hoop (ek-sen'trik-hōp), n. Same as eccentric-strap.

eccentricity (ek-sen'tris'i-ti), n.; pl. eccentricities (-tiz). [= F. excentricité = Sp. excentricidad = Pg. excentricidade = It. eccentricità = D. excentriciteit = G. excentricität = Dan. Sw. excentricitet, < NL. eccentricita (-tis), < eccentricus, < eccentric: see eccentric.] 1. Deviation from a center; the state of a circle with reference to its center not coinciding with that of another circle. —2. In geom. and astron., the distance between the foci of a conic divided by the transverse diameter. The eccentricity of the earth's orbit is .01677, or about $\frac{1}{60}$. —3. In anc. astron., the distance of the center of the equant from the earth. —4. Departure or deviation from that which is stated, regular, or usual; oddity; whimsicalness: as, the eccentricity of a man's genius or conduct.

Akenside was a young man warm with every notion . . . connected with the sound of liberty, and by an eccentricity which such dispositions do not easily avoid, a lover of contradiction, and no friend to anything established.

Johnson, Akenside.

5. An eccentric action or characteristic; a striking peculiarity of character or conduct.

Whose [Frederic William's] eccentricities were such as had never before been seen out of a mad-house.
Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

Also eccentricity in the literal uses.

Angle of eccentricity, in geom., the angle whose sine is equal to the eccentricity of an ellipse. — Bisection of the eccentricity. See bisection. — Temporal eccentricity, in anc. astron., the eccentricity of the orbit of Mercury at any time. Since the eccentric of Mercury was supposed itself to be carried on an eccentric, it follows that the eccentricity would not be a constant quantity.

eccentric-rod (ek-sen'trik-rod), n. In mech., the main connecting-link by which the motion of an eccentric is transmitted.

eccentric-strap (ek-sen'trik-strap), n. In mech., the band of iron which embraces the circumference of an eccentric, and within which it revolves. The eccentric-rod is attached to it. Also called eccentric-hoop.

eccephalosis (ek-sef-a-lō'sis), n. [N.L., < Gr. ek, out, + kephalē, head: see cephalic and -osis.] In obstet., an operation in which the brain of the child is removed to facilitate delivery; excerebration.

ecce signum (ek'sē sig'num), [L., behold, the sign: ecce, behold (see ecce homo); signum, sign: see sign.] Behold, the sign; here is the proof.

echondroma (ek-on-drō'mā), n.; pl. echondromata (-mā-tā). [N.L., < Gr. ek, out of, + chondros, cartilage, + -oma.] A chondroma or cartilaginous tumor growing from the surface of a bone; a chondroma originating in normal cartilage, and forming an outgrowth from it.

echondrosis (ek-on-drō'sis), n. [N.L., < Gr. ek, out of, + chondros, cartilage (cf. ekhondrosēn, make into cartilage), + -osis.] Same as echondroma. Also echondrosis.

ecchymoma (ek-i-mō'mā), n.; pl. ecchymomata (-mā-tā). [N.L., < Gr. ek, out of, + chymos, juice, + -oma.] A swelling on the skin caused by extravasation of blood.

ecchymosed (ek'i-mōst), a. [ecchymos-is + -ed.] Characterized by or partaking of the nature of ecchymosis.

The changes which take place in the colour of an ecchymosed spot are worthy of attention, since they may serve to aid the witness in giving an opinion on the probable time at which a contusion has been inflicted.

A. S. Taylor, Med. Jurisprudence, p. 192.

ecchymosis (ek-i-mō'sis), n.; pl. ecchymoses (-sez). [F. ecchymose, < N.L. ecchymosis, < Gr. ekhymōsis, < ekhymēsthai, shed the blood and leave it extravasated under the skin, < ek, out, + chymos, juice, animal juice, < χένειν, pour: see chyme.] In med., a livid, black, or yellow spot produced by extravasated blood. In dermatology the word usually denotes an extravasation of greater extent than the small spots called petechia.

M. Tardieu states that he has seen these subleural ecchymoses in the body of an infant ten months after death!

A. S. Taylor, Med. Jurisprudence, p. 360.

ecchymotic (ek-i-mō'tik), a. [F. ecchymotique; as ecchymosis (-mōt-) + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of ecchymosis: as, ecchymotic collections.

In purpura hemorrhagica the lesions are usually more numerous, more extensive, ecchymotic in character.

Dühring, Skin Diseases, plate K.

Eccl. An abbreviation (a) of Ecclesiastes; (b) [L. c.] of ecclesiastical.

ecclē, n. See ekklē.

Eccles. An abbreviation (a) of Ecclesiastes; (b) [L. c.] of ecclesiastical.

ecclesia (e-klē'zi-ā), n.; pl. ecclesiae, ecclesias (-ē, -āz). [F. église = Pr. gleiza, glieya, gliezia = Sp. iglesia = Pg. igreja = It. chiesa (also ecclesia), church, < L. ecclesia, an assembly of the (Greek) people, L.L. (also, as in ML., sometimes eclesia) a church, congregation of Christians, = Ar. kelise, kenise = Turk. kilise = Pers. kalisa, kanisa, a church, < Gr. ἐκκλησία, an assembly of the people, LGr. an assembly of Christians, a church, < ἐκκαλέω, summoned, < ἐκκαλέω, summon, call out, < ek, out, + καλέω, call: see calends.] 1. An assembly; the great assembly of the people in certain ancient Greek states, as Athens, at which every free citizen had a right to vote.

The people in the United States, . . . planted, as they are, over large dominions, cannot meet in one assembly, and therefore are not exposed to those tumultuous commotions, like the raging waves of the sea, which always agitated the ecclesia at Athens.

J. Adams, Works, IV, 491.

In ancient Greece and Italy the primitive clan-assembly or township-meeting did not grow by aggregation into the assembly of the shire, but it developed into the comitia or ecclesia of the city. J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 67.

2. A society for Christian worship; a church; a congregation: the Greek and Latin name, sometimes used in English writing with reference to the early church.

ecclesiā (e-klē'zi-ā), a. [ML. ecclesiālis, < L.L. ecclesia, the church: see ecclesia.] Ecclesiastical.

Our ecclesiā and political choices.

Milton, Reformation in Eng., ii.

It is not the part of a King . . . to meddle with Ecclesiā Government. Milton, Eikonoklastes, xiii.

ecclesian (e-klē'zi-ān), n. [ML. ecclesianus, a supporter of the church as against the civil power, also as adj., < L.L. ecclesia, the church: see ecclesia.] One who maintains the supremacy of the ecclesiastical domination over the civil power. Imp. Dict.

ecclesiarch (e-klē'zi-ārk), n. [= F. ecclésiarque, < LGr. ἐκκλησιαρχης, < Gr. ἐκκλησία, an assembly, + ἀρχός, a leader.] 1. A ruler of the church; an ecclesiastical magnate. Bailey, 1727.—2. In the Gr. Ch., a sacrist or sacristan; a church officer who has charge of a church and its contents, and summons the worshippers by semanton or otherwise. In the more important churches the ecclesiarch formerly had minor officials under his authority.

ecclesiast (e-klē'zi-ast), n. [ME. ecclesiaste; = F. ecclésiaste, < L.L. ecclesiastes, < Gr. ἐκκλησιαστής, in classical Gr. a member of the assembly (ecclesia), < ἐκκλησιάζειν, sit in the assembly, debate as an assembly, later call an assembly, LGr. summon to church, come into the church, < ἐκκλησία, an assembly of the people, LGr. a church: see ecclesia. The word ἐκκλησιαστής is usually translated 'preacher,' but this is an imperfect rendering, being rather an inference from the verb ἐκκλησιάζειν in its later sense, 'call an assembly' (hence, by inference, give it directions or admonitions), or from the Heb. word of similar import.] 1. An ecclesiastic; one who addresses the church or assembly of the faithful; a preacher or sacred orator; specifically, with the definite article, Cohélet, or the Preacher—that is, Solomon, or the author of the book of Ecclesiastes.

He was in churche a noble ecclesiaste.

Chaucer, Gen. Pro. to C. T., i. 708.

Though thrive a thousand years are past

Since David's son, the sad and splend.

The weary King Ecclesiast,

Upon his awful tablets penned it.

Thackeray, Vanitas Vanitatum.

2. [cap.] Ecclesiasticus.

Redeth Ecclesiaste of flaterie

Beth ware, ye lordes, of hire trecherie.

Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 507.

Ecclesiastes (e-klē'zi-as'tēs), n. [LL., < Gr. Ἐκκλησιαστής: the title in the Septuagint and hence in the Vulgate version of the book called in Heb. Qōhēlēth, lit. he who calls together an assembly of the people, the gatherer of the people, fem. (in use masc.) part. < qāhal, call, call together (otherwise defined 'heap together'). See ecclesiast.] One of the books of the Old Testament, also called the Preacher. Ecclesiastes is the Greek title in the Septuagint version. But preacher, in its modern signification, is not synonymous with the original. (See the etymology.) The book is a dramatic presentation of the fruitlessness of a life devoted to worldly pleasure or ambition. It purports to be a record of the experience and reflections of Solomon, to whom its authorship is often attributed, but on this point Biblical critics disagree. Often abbreviated Eccl., Eccles.

ecclesiastic (e-klē'zi-as'tik), a. and n. [Formerly also ecclesiastick; < F. ecclésiastique = Sp. eclesiástico = Pg. ecclesiastico = It. ecclesiastico, ecchiastico, ecchesiastico = Sw. ecclesiastik (cf. Gr. ecclesiastichē = Dan. ekklesiastisk = Sw. ecclesiastisk), < L. ecclesiasticus, < Gr. ἐκκλησιαστικός, of or for the assembly, LGr. and LL. of or for the church (as a noun, a church officer, an ecclesiastic) (cf. ἐκκλησιαστής, a member of the assembly, etc.), < ἐκκλησιάζειν, sit in the assembly, LGr. summon to church, etc.: see ecclesia, ecclesiast.] 1. a. Ecclesiastical; specifically, pertaining to the ministry or administration of the church. [Now rare.]

And pulpit, drum ecclesiastick,

Was beat with fist instead of a stick.

S. Butler, Hudibras, I. i. 11.

An ecclesiastic person . . . ought not to live in splend and vain ornaments. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 7.

A church of England man has a true veneration for the scheme established among us of ecclesiastick government.

Swift.

II. n. 1. In early usage, a member of the orthodox church, as distinguished from Jews, pagans, infidels, and heretics.

I must here observe farther that the name of ecclesiastics was sometimes attributed to all Christians in general. Bentham.

2. One holding an office in the Christian ministry, or otherwise officially consecrated to the service of the church: usually restricted to those connected with an episcopate, and in the middle ages to subordinate officials.

Among the Roman Catholics, all monks, and, in the Church of England, the various dignitaries who perform the episcopal functions, are entitled ecclesiastics.

Crabb, English Synonymes, p. 369.

From a humble ecclesiastic, he was subsequently preferred to the highest dignities of the church. Prescott.

ecclesiastical (e-klē'zi-as'ti-kal), a. [ecclesiastic + -al.] Pertaining or relating to the church; churchly; not civil or secular: as, ecclesiastical discipline or government; ecclesiastical affairs, history, or polity; ecclesiastical courts. Sometimes abbreviated eccl., eccles.

There are in men operations, some natural, some rational, some supernatural, some politic, some finally ecclesiastical. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, l. 16.

A Bishop, as a Bishop, had never any Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction. Selden, Table-Talk, p. 22.

The Anglo-Saxon sovereigns, acting in the closest union with their bishops, made ecclesiastical laws which clothed the spiritual enactments with coercive authority.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 298.

Ecclesiastical books, in the early church, books allowed to be read in church, especially those read for edification and for the instruction of catechumens, but not belonging in the strictest sense to the canon of Scripture. This name was applied in such books which were named the sixth of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, after the canonical books of the Old Testament, as "the other books," and collected in the King James Bible under the heading "Apocrypha." — Ecclesiastical calendar. See calendar. — Ecclesiastical colors. See color. — Ecclesiastical commission. (a) A court appointed by Queen Elizabeth, and invested by her with nearly absolute powers, for the purpose of regulating religious opinions, and punishing all departure from the church standards either in doctrine or in ritual. It was subsequently abolished by Parliament. (b) A standing commission in England, created by Parliament in the early part of the nineteenth century, invested with important powers for the reform of the established church. Its plans have to be submitted, after due notice to persons interested, to the sovereign in council, and be ratified by orders in council; but after ratification and due publication they have the same effect as acts of Parliament. — Ecclesiastical councils. See council, 7. — Ecclesiastical courts, church courts in which the canon law is administered and ecclesiastical causes are tried. In countries in which the church is established by law, the decisions of these courts have a binding legal effect, and the courts constitute a part of the judicial machinery of the community; in other countries their decisions are binding only within the church, and enforced only by church discipline. In England there are several ecclesiastical courts. That of primary resort is the Consistory Court of the diocese; from it appeals go to the Court of Arches, and from there to the Privy Council. In the Protestant Episcopal Church of America the administration of discipline of lay members is wholly in the hands of the rector, an appeal lying to the bishop. The method of proceeding against clergymen in each diocese is determined by diocesan canons. A bishop is tried by the House of Bishops. In the Presbyterian Church the ecclesiastical courts are the Session, Presbytery, Synod, and General Assembly, the last being the court of last resort; in the Methodist Church trials are had before a church committee, with an appeal to the Conference; in both churches there are provisions for the constitution of courts for the trial of clergymen for false doctrine or immoral conduct. In churches of the Congregational system there are no ecclesiastical courts; the local church is the only tribunal recognized. In the Roman Catholic Church there are bishops' courts for the trial of ordinary church causes, the trial of bishops being reserved to the pope; but the methods of procedure differ according to the position of the church in different countries. — Ecclesiastical epistles, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., letters written by church dignitaries officially, and carrying with them ecclesiastical authority, as apostolic epistles written by the Roman pontiff in virtue of his apostolic authority, commendatory epistles (see commendatory), dismissory epistles (see dismissory), encyclical epistles (see encyclical), pastoral epistles, and epistles of instruction to particular churches. — Ecclesiastical fast. See fast, 8. — Ecclesiastical history, the history of the church from the beginning to the present time, including both Old Testament and New Testament history; more specifically, the history of the Christian church, including both its interior and its exterior development—that is, its organization and also the development of its doctrinal beliefs. — Ecclesiastical law, the law of the church as administered in the ecclesiastical courts; in a more general sense, especially in those countries where there is no church establishment, the whole body of the law relating to religion or religious institutions as administered in the civil courts. — Ecclesiastical mode. See mode. — Ecclesiastical moon, or calendar moon, a fictitious month used in determining the date of Easter. It is made purposely to depart from the natural month, to avoid the possibility of a coincidence of Easter with the Jewish Passover. — Ecclesiastical notary. See notary. — Ecclesiastical polity, the principles and laws of church government. — Ecclesiastical state, the body of the clergy.

A King . . . in whose time also began that great alteration in the state ecclesiastical. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 131.

ecclesiastically (e-klē-zī-as'ti-kal-i), adv. By the church; as regards the constitution, laws, doctrines, etc., of the church.

It is both naturally and ecclesiastically good.

Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, iii. 5.

ecclesiasticism (e-klē-zī-as'ti-tizm), n. [< ecclesiastic + -ism.] Strong adherence to the principles and organization of the church, or to ecclesiastical observances, privileges, etc.; devotion to the interests of the church and the extension of its influence in its external relations.

My religious convictions and views have remained free from any tincture of ecclesiasticism. Westminster Rev.

Puseyites and ritualists, aiming to reinforce ecclesiasticism, betray a decided leaning towards archaic print, as well as archaic ornaments.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 107.

Ethical forces for all the reforms of society are stored in the Christian church, but the battery is insulated by ecclesiasticism. N. A. Rev., CXII. 246.

Ecclesiastical (e-klē-zī-as'ti-kus), n. [LL., prop. adj., of or belonging to the church: see ecclesiastic.] The name in the Latin version of the Bible, and the alternative name in the English Apocrypha, of the book called in the Septuagint "The Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach," included in the canon of the Old Testament by the Roman Catholic and Greek churches, but regarded as apocryphal by Jews and Protestants, though occasionally read in the Anglican Church. In form it resembles the Book of Proverbs. It is supposed to have been originally compiled in Hebrew or Aramaean about 180 B. C., and translated into Greek about 130 B. C. Abbreviated Ecclesi.

ecclesiography (e-klē-zī-og'ra-fi), n. [< LGr. ἐκκλησία, the church, + Gr. γραφία, < γράφω, write.] The history of churches, their locality, doctrines, polity, and condition. The Congregationalist, July 2, 1879.

ecclesiological (e-klē-zī-ol'jō-i-kal), a. [< ecclesiology + -ical.] Of or pertaining to ecclesiology; treating of ecclesiology.

Colossians is christological, and represents Christ as the true pleroma or plenitude of the Godhead, the totality of divine attributes and powers; Ephesians is ecclesiological, and exhibits the ideal church as the body of Christ, as the reflected pleroma of Christ, "the fulness of Him who filleth all in all." Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, I. § 96.

Mr. Butler candidly admits that in ecclesiological and ritual knowledge he started with but a scanty outfit. Edinburgh Rev., CLXIII. 27.

ecclesiologist (e-klē-zī-ol'jō-jist), n. [< ecclesiology + -ist.] One versed in ecclesiology; an expounder of ecclesiology.

For the ecclesiologist proper there is a prodigious bal-dachin, and a grand display of metal-work behind the high altar. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 282.

ecclesiology (e-klē-zī-ol'jō-jī), n. [< LGr. ἐκκλησία, the church, + Gr. λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] 1. The science of the church as an organized society, and of whatever relates to its outward expression or manifestation.

Christology naturally precedes ecclesiology in the order of the system, as Christ precedes the church.

Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, I. § 96.

It will furnish future writers in the history and ecclesiology of Ireland with a most valuable storehouse of information. Athenæum.

2. The science of church architecture and decoration. It treats of all the details of church furniture, ornament, etc., and their symbolism, and is cultivated especially by the High Church party in the Church of England.

Eastern Ecclesiology may be divided into two grand branches, Byzantine and Armenian.

J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I. 169.

eccles-tree (ek'lz-trē), n. A dialectal variant of axletree. [Prov. Eng.]

Ecclos. An abbreviation of Ecclesiasticus.

eccopet (ek'ō-pē), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκκοπή, a cutting out, an incision, < ἐκκόπτειν, cut out, < ἐκ, out, + κόπτειν, cut.] In surg., the act of cutting out; excision; specifically, a perpendicular division of the cranium by a cutting instrument.

eccoprotic (ek'ō-prot'ik), a. and n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκκοπρωτικός, < ἐκκοπρῶν (only in pass.), clear of dung, < ἐκ, out, + κόπρος, dung.] 1. a. Having the quality of promoting alvine discharges; laxative; loosening; gently cathartic.

II. n. A medicine which purges gently, or which tends to promote evacuations by stool; a laxative.

Eccremocarpus (ek're-mō-kār'pus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκρεμάρης, hanging from or upon (< ἐκρεμασθαι, hang from), + καρπός, fruit.] A genus of climbing shrubs, natural order Bignoni- aceæ, containing three species, natives of South America. They have twice-pinnatisect leaves with small membranaceous leaflets, and green or yellow five-lobed flowers. E. scaber is cultivated as an ornamental creeper.

ecrinology (ek-ri-nol'ō-jī), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ἐκρίνειν, separate (< ἐκ, out, + κρίνειν, separate), + λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] That branch of physiology which relates to the secretions and the act of secretion.

eccrisist (ek'ri-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκκρίσις, separation, < ἐκκρίτος, separated, < ἐκκρίνειν, choose out, separate, < ἐκ, out, + κρίνειν, separate: see crisis.] In med.: (a.) The expulsion or excretion of any waste products or products of disease. (b.) The excreted products themselves.

eccritic (e-krit'ik), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκκριτικός, secretive, < ἐκκρίτος, secreted, separated: see eccrisist.] A medicine that promotes excretion; an eliminative.

eccyesis (ek-si-ē'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. as if *ἐκκύναις, < ἐκκύνειν, bring forth, put forth as leaves, < ἐκ, forth, + κύνειν, be pregnant.] Extra-uterine gestation, or the development of the fetus outside of the cavity of the uterus, as in a Fallopian tube, an ovary, or the abdominal cavity.

eccyliosis (ek-sil-i-ō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκκυλίωσις, be unrolled (develop) (< ἐκ, out, + κυλίειν, roll up: see cylinder), + -osis.] In pathol., a disease or disturbance of development; a disorder resulting from the process of development.

ecderon (ek'de-ron), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκ, out, + δέρος, skin.] An outer layer of integument, as the epithelial layer of mucous membrane, or the epidermal layer of the skin: distinguished from enderon, the deeper layer.

ecderonic (ek-de-ron'ik), a. [< ecderon + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the ecderon; epidermal or epithelial.

Teeth in Mollusca and Annulosa are always ecderonic, cuticular, or epithelial structures.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 80.

ecdysis (ek'di-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκδύσις, a getting out, < ἐκδύειν, get out of, strip off, < ἐκ, out, + δύνειν, get into, enter.] The act of putting off, coming out of, or emerging; the act of shedding or casting an outer coat or integument, as in the case of serpents and certain insects, or the feathers of birds; the molt: opposed to endysis.

ecgonine (ek'gō-nin), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκγονος, born (as a noun, a child) (< ἐκ, out of, + γονός, born: see gony), + -ine².] In chem., a base obtained from cocaine by the action of hydrochloric acid. It is soluble in water.

échancrure (F. pron. ā-shōn'krür'), n. [F., a hollowing out, scallop, slope, < échancrer, cut sloping, lit. cut crabwise, < é, < L. ex, out, + chancre, < L. cancer, a crab: see cancer.] In anat. and zool., a notch, nick, or indentation, as on the edge or surface of a part; an emargination; a shallow fissure. It is more than a mere depression, and less than a furcation or forking.

échauguette (F. pron. ā-shō-ge't'), n. [F., a watch-turret, < OF. eschauquette, eschalquette, oldest form eschargaite (ML. reflex. scaragayta), orig. a company on guard, then a single sentinel, then a sentry-box, watch-turret (cf. Walloon scarwaister, be on the watch), < OHG. *skarwahta, MHG. scharwate (G. scharwache), < OHG. skara, MHG. G. schar, a company, a division or detail of an army, a crowd, + *wahta, MHG. wachte, G. wacht, a watch, > OF. waite, guaitte, E. wait: see wait.] A bartizan.

éche¹, a. and pron. A Middle English form of eche.

éche², v. t. An obsolete form of eke.

éche³, a. A Middle English form of ache¹.

éche⁴, a. [ME., earlier ece, < AS. ēce, everlasting, eternal; cf. OS. ewig = OFries. ewich, ewig = D. eeuwig = OHG. ewic, MHG. ewic, ewec, G. ewig = Dan. Sw. ewig, everlasting, eternal, < OHG. ēwa, etc., = Goth. awes, an age, eternity: see ay¹, age, etern.] Everlasting; eternal.

Than like song that ever is eche.

Owl and Nightingale, l. 742.

In helle heo schulle forberne

On eche sorynesse.

Old Eng. Miscellany (ed. Morris), p. 72.

echelon (esh'e-lon), n. [< F. échelon (= Sp. escalón), a round of a ladder, a step, stepping-stone, echelon, < échelle, OF. eschelle = Pr. Sp. Pg. escala = It. scala, < L. scala, a ladder: see scale².] A step-like arrangement or order; specifically, a military disposition of troops of such a nature that each division, brigade, regiment, company, or other body occupies a position parallel to, but not in the same alinement with, that in front, thus presenting the appearance of steps, and capable of being formed into one line by moving each of the less advanced divisions, etc., forward until they all aline. Troops so disposed are said to be in echelon. A fleet is said to be in echelon when it presents a wedge-form to the enemy, so that the bow-guns and broadsides of the several ships can defend one another.

The beaters moved in echelon by the hill-top as well as they could. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 166.

The friends were standing where the Catskill hills lay before them in echelon towards the river, the ridges lapping over each other and receding in the distance.

C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 54.

echelon (esh'e-lon), v. t. [< échelon, n.] To form in echelon.

The Russian army of the Lom in the end of July was echeloned along the road to Rustchuk, waiting for the word to surround that fortress.

Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 128.

echelon-lens (esh'e-lon-len-z), n. A compound lens used for lighthouses, having a series of concentric annular lenses arranged round a central lens, so that all have a common focus.

echeneidan (ek-e-nē-i-dan), n. A fish of the family Echeneidæ. Sir J. Richardson.

echeneidid (ek-e-nē-i-did), n. A fish of the family Echeneidæ.

Echeneididæ (ek'e-nē-i-dī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echeneis (-id-) + -idæ.] A family of teleostean fishes, representing the suborder Discocephali, and typified by the genus Echeneis. The body is elongated, broad in front, and tapering to the caudal fin; the head is flat, horizontal above, and surmounted by an oval disk. This disk is composed of numerous (10 to 27) transverse bars, pectinated behind, and divided into pairs by a median longitudinal leathery partition, and is surrounded by a leathery margin. This formation is homologous with a set of dorsal spines, and is in fact an extremely modified dorsal fin. A normal dorsal is developed on the hinder part of the body, and the anal nearly corresponds to it. The ventrals are thoracic in position, and have 5 rays, and a slender spine closely attached to the adjoining ray. By means of the disk, acting as a sucker, these fishes attach themselves to other animals. They are known to sailors and fishermen as suckers or sucking-fishes. About a dozen species are known; the most common are Echeneis naucrates and Remora remora. Also Echeneida, Echeneidini. See pilot-fish, remora.

Echeneidini (ek-e-nē-i-dī-nī), n. pl. [NL., < Echeneis (-id-) + -ini.] Same as Echeneididæ. Bonaparte, 1837.

echeneidoid (ek'e-nē-i-doid), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Echeneidæ.

II. n. A fish of the family Echeneidæ.

Echeneis (ek-e-nē-is), n. [L., < Gr. ἐχενίς (-id-), the remora, supposed to have the power of holding ships back, prop. adj., ship-holding, < ἐχέω, hold, + νῆα, < L. navis, a ship.] The typical genus of the family Echeneidæ, having on the top of the head a large, flat, laminated disk or sucker, composed of numerous transverse plates set obliquely upward and backward, forming an adhesive surface by which the fish attaches itself to various objects, as a larger fish, a ship's bottom, etc. The type is the common remora or sucking-fish, E. naucrates. By some it is extended to include all the species of the family, and by others restricted to elongated slender species with numerous plates to the suckers, like E. naucrates.

Sucking-fish (Echeneis remora).

echeum (ē-kē'um), n.; pl. echea (-ā). [L. ēchēa, < Gr. ἔχηα, pl. of ἔχηον, a kind of loud kettle-drum or gong, < ἔχος, ἔχη, a sound, esp. a loud sound, roar, ἔχειν, sound, ring: see echo.] In arch., one of the sonorous bell-shaped vases of bronze or clay which the ancients are said to have introduced in the construction of their theaters to give greater power to the voices of the actors. See acoustic vessel, under acoustic.

Echeveria (ech-e-vē'ri-ā), n. [NL., named after Echeverri, a botanic artist.] A genus of succulent plants, natural order Crassulaceæ, chiefly natives of Mexico. It is now included in the genus Cotyledon.

echiaster (ek-i-as'tēr), n. [NL., prop. echinaster (which is used in another application: see Echinaster) < Gr. ἔχινος, hedgehog, + ἀστέρα, a star.] 1. A kind of stellate sponge-spicule. Sollas.—2. [cap.] A genus of coleopterous insects. Erichson.

Echidna (e-kid'nā), n. [NL., < L. echidna, < Gr. ἐχίδνα, an adder, viper, < ἐχίς, an adder, viper: see Echis.] 1. In ichth., a genus of anguilliform fishes; generally accounted a synonym of Mura- na. Forster, 1778. [Not in use.] — 2. In herpet., a genus of reptiles: used by Wagler and others for the genus of vipers (Viperidae) called Bitis by Gray and Cope. Merrem, 1820. [Not in use.] — 3. In mammal.: (a) The typical genus of the family Echidnidae, containing the aculeated ant-eater or spiny ant-eater of Australia and Tasmania, E. hystrix or aculeata, and another species, E. laevis of New Guinea, together with a fossil one, E. owenii. They have 5 toes on each foot; the snout is straight and moderately developed. Tachyglossus is the same, and is the name properly to be used for this genus according to zoological rules of nomenclature, the name Echidna having been preoccupied in another sense, though it has most currency in this sense. See Acanthoglossus, ant-eater. Cuvier, 1797. (b) [l. c.] A species of the genus Echidna or family Echidnidae. The echidna resembles a large hedgehog, excepting that the spines are much longer, and the snout is long and slender, with a small aperture at the end for the protrusion of the long, flexible, worm-like tongue. The animal is nocturnal, fossorial, and insectivorous, and catches insects with its long, sticky tongue, whence it is known as the porcupine ant-eater. The echidna is closely related to the ornithorhynchus, or duck-billed platypus, and, like it, is oviparous.

4. A genus of echinoderms. De Blainville, 1830. Echidnae (e-kid'nē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of echidna, < L. echidna, an adder, viper: see Echidna.] A group of bombycid moths. Hübner, 1816.

Echidnidae (e-kid'ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echidna + -idae.] The family of monotrematous ornithodelphian or prototherian mammals constituted by the genera Echidna (or Tachyglossus) and Zaglossus (or Acanthoglossus). They have, in addition to the ordinal and superordinal characters which they share with Ornithorhynchidae, convoluted cerebral hemispheres, perforated acetabulum, as in birds, the facial region of the skull produced into a long, slender rostrum with the nostrils at its end, styliform mandibular rami, vermiform protrusile tongue, no true teeth, feet not webbed, but furnished with long claws, and no tibial spur. The family is properly called Tachyglossidae.

Zaglossus or Acanthoglossus bruijnii.

Echidnina (ek-id-ni'nā), n. pl. [NL., < Echidna + -ina.] A group of mammals represented by Echidna. Bonaparte, 1837.

echidnine (e-kid'nin), n. [< L. echidna, viper, + -ine.] Serpent-poison; the secretion from the poison-glands of the viper and other serpents. Echidnine is a clear, viscid, neutral, yellowish fluid, containing albumin, mucus, fatty matter, a yellow coloring principle, and, among its salts, phosphates and chlorides. Associated with the albumin is a peculiar nitrogenous body, to which the name echidnine is more particularly applied. The poison-bag of a viper seldom contains more than 2 grains of the poisonous liquid; 2½ of a grain is sufficient to kill a small bird.

Echimyidae (ek-i-mi'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echimy + -idae.] A family of hystricomorphic rodents, taking name from the genus Echimy. Also Echinomyidae.

Echimyina (e-ki-mi-i'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Echimy + -ina.] A subfamily of hystricomorphic rodents, of the family Octodontidae, related to the porcupines; the hedgehog-rats. It is a large group of numerous genera, differing much in external form and aspect. The African ground-squirrel Aulacoceros swinderianus, belongs to this subfamily, as do the West Indian genera Cayromys and Plagiodon. (See cut under Aulacoceros.) All the rest of the genera are South American. Of these the coypou, Myopotamus coypus, is the best-known form, though not a typical one. (See cut under coypou.) The most representative genera are Echimy and Loncheros, or the spiny rats proper, of which there are a dozen or more species, having prickles in the fur. Cercomys, Dactylopsys, and Mesomys are other examples without spines. Carletonodonta is a fossil genus from the bone-caves of Brazil. Also written Echimyina, Echimyina, Echimyidina, and, more correctly, Echimyini.

Echimyina (ek-i-mi'nā), n. pl. [NL., < Echimy + -ina.] Same as Echimyini.

Echimyus (e-ki-mis), n. [NL., contr. of Echinomys, lit. 'hedge-rat' (so called from the fact that the pelage is bristly or mixed with flattened spines), < Gr. ἐχίμος, a hedgehog, + μῦς = E. mouse.] The typical genus of the subfamily Echimyina; the spiny rats proper. All the species are South American; E. cayennensis is the best-known. Geoffroy, 1809. Also written Echimyus, and properly Echimyus.

Spiny Rat (Echymys cayennensis).

echint, n. [ME., < L. echinus: see echinus.] A sea-hedgehog; a sea-urchin.

Men . . . known whiche strondes habounden most of tendre fishes or of sharpe fishes that hygen echynmys. Chaucer, Boethius, p. 82.

Echinacea (ek-i-nā'sē-ā), n. [NL. (so called on account of the long spinescent bracts of the columnar receptacle), < Gr. ἐχίμος, a hedgehog, + -acea.] A genus of coarse composite plants of the prairies of North America, allied to Rudbeckia, but with long rose-colored rays and prickly-pointed chaff. There are two species, which are occasionally cultivated. Their thick black roots have a pungent taste, and are used in popular medicine under the name of black-sampson.

Echinarachnius (e-ki-na-rak'ni-us), n. [NL. (Leske, 1778), < Gr. ἐχίμος, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + ἀράχνη, a spider.] A genus of flat, irregular petalostichous sea-urchins, of the family Melithidae (or Scutellidae), with no perforations or lunules. E. parma, of the Pacific and Atlantic coasts of the United States, is known as the sand-dollar or cake-urchin. E. excentricus is the common cake-urchin of the Pacific coast. See cut under cake-urchin.

Echinaster (ek-i-nas'tēr), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίμος, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + ἀστήρ, a star.] A genus of starfishes, of the family Solastriidae.

Echinaster sentus.

E. sepositus is an example. E. sentus is a West Indian species, extending northward on the Atlantic coast of the United States, having the spines sheathed in membrane and occurring only at the angles of the calcareous plates of the upper surface. Cribella is a synonym.

Echinasteridae (e-ki-nas'tēr'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinaster + -idae.] A family of starfishes with two rows of tube-feet, a skeletal frame of lengthened ossicles, and spines on those of the dorsal surface: a synonym of Solastriidae.

echinate (ek'i-nāt), a. [< L. echinus, set with prickles, prickly, < echinus, a hedgehog: see echinus.] Spiny, like a hedgehog; bristling with sharp points; bristly. An echinate surface is one thickly covered with sharp elevations like spines bristling, and is to be distinguished from a muricate surface, in which the elevations are scattered, lower, and not so acute.

echinated (ek'i-nā-ted), a. [< echinate + -ed.] Rendered prickly or bristly.

Fibre echinated by laterally projecting spicules. Lendenfeld.

Echini (e-ki'ni), n. pl. [L., pl. of echinus, a hedgehog, sea-urchin: see echinus.] 1. In Cuvier's system of classification, the second family of pedicellate echinoderms, containing the sea-urchins: equivalent to several modern families, or to the whole of the order or class Echinoidea. — 2. [l. c.] Plural of echinus.

echinid (ek'i-nid), n. One of the Echinidae. Echinidae (ek-in'i-dā), n. pl. Same as Echinidae. Echinidae (e-kin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinus + -idae.] A family of regular desmostichous or endocyclic sea-urchins, of the order Endocyclida and class Echinoidea, having a thin round shell.

with broad ambulacral spaces bearing tubercles and spines, the latter mostly short and pyriform, and oral branchiae; the typical sea-urchins or sea-eggs. The genera are numerous, such as Echinus, Echinothrix, Toxopneustes, etc.

echinidan (e-kin'i-dan), n. A sea-urchin; one of the Echinidae.

echiniform (e-ki'ni-fōrm), a. In entom., same as echinoid.

Echiniscus (ek-i-nis'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίμος, a hedgehog, + -ισκος, dim. suffix.] A genus of bear-animalcules or water-bears, of the family Macrobiotidae: a synonym is Emydium. E. bellermanni is an example.

echinital (e-kin'i-tal), a. [< echinite + -al.] Pertaining to an echinite or fossil sea-urchin.

echinite (e-ki'nit), n. [< Gr. ἐχίμος, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + -ίτης.] A fossil sea-urchin. Echinites are found in all fossiliferous strata, but are most abundant and best preserved in the Chalk. The term is an indefinite one, these fossils being of various genera, as Goniodonta, Echinothuria, etc. The Paleozoic echinites form an order Palaechinoidae, represented by such genera as Palaechinus, Ecodonta, etc. See cut under Echinothuriidae.

Echinobothria (e-ki-nō-both'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL. (Rudolphi), pl. of Echinobothrium.] A group named for the cestoid worms. See Echinobothrium.

Echinobothrium (e-ki-nō-both'rium), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίμος, a hedgehog, + βόθριον, dim. of βόθρος, a pit, trench.] A genus of cestoid worms, or tapeworms, of the family Diphyllidae, having on the head two fossettes with hooks. The separated proglottides continue to live and grow for some time independently. E. minimum and E. typus are examples. Also Echinobothrium.

Echinobrisidae (e-ki-nō-bris'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinobrisus + -idae.] A family of irregular sea-urchins, typified by the genus Echinobrisus.

Echinobrisus (e-ki-nō-bris'us), n. [NL., prop. Echinobryssus*, < Gr. ἐχίμος, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + βρύσσω, a kind of sea-urchin.] The typical genus of the family Echinobrisidae.

Echinocactus (e-ki-nō-kak'tus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίμος, a hedgehog, + κάκτος, cactus.] A genus of cactace-ous plants, globose or oval, and sometimes gigantic, strongly ribbed, or with tubercles in vertical or spiral rows. They are armed with clusters of short spines, at the base of which, upon the younger parts of the plant, are borne the large and showy flowers. Over 200 species have been described, mostly Mexican, with a considerable number within the limits of the United States.

Echinocactus viridescens.

Echinocardium (e-ki-nō-kār'di-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίμος, a hedgehog, + καρδιά = E. heart.] A genus of spatangoid sea-urchins, or heart-urchins, of the family Spatangidae. E. cordatum occurs on both coasts of the Atlantic. Leske, 1778. Also called Amphidotus.

Echinocardium cordatum.

echinochrome (e-ki-nō-krom), n. [< Gr. ἐχίμος, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + χρῶμα, color.] See the extract.

Dr. C. A. MacMunn describes the spectroscopic or chemical characters of the blood of various worms and mollusks. One of the most interesting pigments which he has detected is that which he calls echinochrome, . . . obtained from the perivisceral cavity of Strongylocentrotus lividus.

Jour. Roy. Microsc. Soc., 2d ser., VI. 1. 48.

echinococci, n. Plural of echinococcus. Echinococcifer (e-ki-nō-kok'si-fēr), n. [NL., < echinococcus + L. ferre = E. bear¹.] A genus of tapeworms, in which, in the hydatid state, the tentacles head bud in special brood-capsules in such a way that their invagination is turned toward the lumen of the vesicle, as in the echinococcus of Tania echinococcus. Claus.

echinococcus (e-ki-nō-kok'us), n.; pl. echinococci (-si). [NL., < Gr. ἐχίμος, a hedgehog, + κόκκος, a berry: see coccus.] Tania echinococcus in its larval (scolex) stage, which forms the so-called hydatids occurring in the liver, brain, etc., of man and other animals; the hydatid form of the wandered scolex of Tenia echinococcus, having deuteroscolices or daughter-cysts formed by gemmation. This hydatid is that of the tapeworm of the dog, having several tenia-heads in the cyst; it may occur in man, commonly in the liver, giving rise to very serious disease. The word was originally a genus name, given by Rudolphi before the relationship to Tenia was known; it is now used as the name of the larval stage of the tapeworm whose specific name is the same. See cut under Tenia.

In Echinococcus the structure of the cystic worm is . . . complicated by its proliferation, the result of which is the formation of many bladder-worms, inclosed one within the other, and contained in a strong laminated sac or cyst, apparently of a chitinous nature, secreted by the parasite. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 186.

Echinoconida (e-ki-nō-kōn'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinoconus + -ida.] A family of fossil regular sea-urchins.

Echinoconus (e-ki-nō-kō-nus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + κῶνος, a cone: see cone.] The typical genus of Echinoconidae. Breyn.

Echinocorida (e-ki-nō-kōr'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinocorus + -ida.] A family of irregular sea-urchins, chiefly of the Cretaceous formation.

Echinocorus (ek-i-nōk'ō-rus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + (f) κόρυς, a bug.] The typical genus of Echinocoridae. Schröter.

Echinocrepis (e-ki-nō-krē'pis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + κρηπίς, a boat.] A genus of spatangoid sea-urchins, or heart-urchins, of the family Spatangidae, of a triangular form, with the anal system on the lower or actinal surface. E. cuneata is a deep-sea form of southern seas. Agassiz, 1879.

Echinocystis (e-ki-nō-sis'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + κύστις, a bladder: see cyst.] A cucurbitaceous genus of plants of the eastern United States, of a single annual species, E. lobata. It has numerous white flowers, and an oval, prickly fruit, which becomes dry and bladderly, and opens at the top for the discharge of the seeds. It is frequently cultivated for ornament, and is known as the wild balsam-apple. By some authorities the genus is extended to include Megarrhiza and other western and Mexican species.

Echinoderes (ek-i-nod'e-rēs), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + δέρμ, neck.] A singular genus of minute worm-like animals of uncertain position, supposed to be intermediate in some respects between the wheel-animalcules and the crustaceans. The rounded head is furnished with recurved hooks, and is succeeded by 10 or 11 distinct segments, the last of which is bifurcated;

Echinoderes dujardini, greatly enlarged.

the segments bear paired setae; there are no limbs, and the nervous system appears to be represented by a single cephalic ganglion; and eye-spots are present. It is the typical genus of the family Echinoderidae. E. dujardini is an example. It is a small marine worm, scarcely half a millimeter long, with a distinct retractile head, caudal setae, and ten rings of setae along the body, giving an appearance of segmentation.

Echinoderidae (e-ki-nō-der'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinoderes + -ida.] A family of animalcules, by some considered related to the rotifers, based upon the genus Echinoderes. It is often located with the gastrotrichous worms.

Echinoderidae, which Dujardin and Greef regarded as connecting links between Vermes and Arthropoda. Claus, Zoology (trans.), I. 404.

echinoderm (e-ki-nō-derm), a. and n. [< Echinoderma.] I. a. Having a prickly covering; echinodermatous.

II. n. Any one of the Echinodermata.

All echinoderms have a calcareous skeleton and many are provided with movable spines. A characteristic apparatus of vessels, termed the ambulacral or water-vascular system, is present. It is composed of a ring round the pharynx, from which proceed a number of radiating canals, commonly giving off caecal appendages (Polian vesicles), as well as branches which enter the retractile tube- feet, often furnished with a terminal disk or sucker, which with the spines are the organs of locomotion. The madreporic canal connects the pharyngeal ring with the exterior. Pascoe, Zool. Class., p. 40.

Echinoderma (e-ki-nō-der'mā), n. pl. [NL.: see Echinodermata.] Same as Echinodermata. Owen.

echinodermal (e-ki-nō-der'mal), a. [< echinoderm + -al.] Same as echinodermatous.

The harder, spine-clad or echinoderm species perplex the most patient and persevering dissector by the extreme complexity and diversity of their constituent parts. Owen, Anat., x.

Echinodermaria (e-ki-nō-der-mā'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., as Echinoderma + -aria.] A group of echinoderms. De Blainville, 1830.

Echinodermata (e-ki-nō-der'mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of echinodermatus: see echinodermatous.] A phylum or subkingdom of metazoic animals; the echinoderms. They represent one of the most distinct types of the animal kingdom, agreeing with coelenterates in having a radiate or actinometric arrangement of parts, usually pentamerous or by fives or tens, a digestive canal, a water-vascular or ambulacral apparatus, a true blood-vascular system, and the integument indurated by calcareous deposits, as either granules, spicules, or hard plates forming a shell. The alimentary canal is distinct from the general body-cavity; there is a deuterosomatous oral orifice or mouth, and usually an anus. The sexes are mostly distinct. The species undergo metamorphosis; the free-swimming ciliated embryo is known as a pluteus, in some cases as an echinopluteus (see cut under echinopluteus); the adult form is usually assumed by a complicated kind of secondary development from the larval form, which is mostly bilateral. The Echinodermata were so named by Klein in 1734, and in Cuvier's system were the first class of his Radiata; they are still sometimes reduced to a class with the Coelenterata. As a subkingdom they are divisible into four classes: Crinoidae, Echinoidea, Asteroidea, and Holothurioidae, or the crinoids, sea-urchins, starfishes, and sea-cucumbers. As a class they are sometimes divided directly into seven orders: Echinoidea (sea-urchins), Asteroidea (starfishes), Ophiuroidea (sand-stars and brittle-stars), Crinoidae (feather-stars), Cystoidea (extinct), Blastoidea (extinct), and Holothurioidae (sea-cucumbers). All are marine. Also Echinodermata.

The organization of the Echinodermata does in fact appear so different from that of the coelenterates, and seems to belong to a so much higher grade of development, that the combination of the two groups as Radiata is inadmissible, and so much the more so since the radial arrangement of the structure exhibits some transitions towards a bilateral symmetry. The Echinodermata are separated from the Coelenterata by the possession of a separate alimentary canal and vascular system, and also by a number of peculiar features both of organization and of development. Claus, Zoology (trans.), I. 267.

echinodermatous (e-ki-nō-der'mā-tus), a. [< NL. echinodermatus, < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + δέρμα (r-), skin.] Having a spiculate or indurated skin; specifically, of or pertaining to the echinoderms or Echinodermata. Also echinodermal.

Echinodes (ek-i-nō-dēs), n. [NL. (Le Conte, 1869), < Gr. ἐχίνος, like a hedgehog, prickly, < ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + εἶδος, form.] 1. In entom., a genus of beetles, of the family Histeridae, with two North American species, E. setiger and E. decipiens.—2. A genus of insectivorous mammals: same as Hemicentetes.

Echinoglossa (e-ki-nō-glos'sā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + γλῶσσα, the tongue.] A grade or series of Mollusca, represented by the gastropods, cephalopods, pteropods, and scaphopods, as collectively distinguished from the Lipoglossa (which see) alone. In E. R. Lankester's arrangement of Mollusca, the Echinoglossa are divided into three classes: Gastropoda, Cephalopoda (including Pteropoda), and Scaphopoda. Odontoglossa is a synonym.

echinoglossal (e-ki-nō-glos'sal), a. and n. [< Echinoglossa + -al.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Echinoglossa.

II. n. A member of the Echinoglossa.

echinoid (e-ki'noid), a. and n. [< Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + εἶδος, form. Cf. Echinodes.] I. a. 1. Having the form or appearance of a sea-urchin: in entomology, applied to certain insect-eggs which are shaped like an echinoid, and covered with crowded deep pits.—2. Pertaining to the Echinoidea.

II. n. In zool., one of the Echinoidea.

The spheroidal echinoids, in reality, depart further from the general plan and from the embryonic form than the elongated spatangoids do. Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 223.

Echinoidea (ek-i-nōi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Echinus + -oidea.] A class of the phylum or subkingdom Echinodermata; the sea-urchins or sea-eggs. They have a rounded, depressed (not elongated) form, subspherical, cordiform, or discoid, inclosed in a test or shell composed of many calcareous plates closely and usually immovably connected, studded with tubercles and bearing movable spines, and perforated in some places for the emission of tube-feet; an oral and anal orifice always present, a convoluted intestine, a water-vascular system, a blood-vascular system, and sometimes respiratory as well as ambulatory appendages. The perforated plates are the ambulacra, alternating with imperforate interambulacral plates; there are usually five pairs of each. The anus is dorsal or superior, the mouth ventral or inferior; the latter in many forms has a complicated internal skeleton. The general arrangement of parts is radiate or actinometric, with triradiate divisions of parts; but bilaterality is recognizable in many adults, and perfectly expressed in the larval forms. The Echinoidea are divisible into Regularia, Desmoticia, or Endocyclia, containing the ordinary symmetrically globose forms, as Cidaris, Echinus, and Echinometra; and the Irregularia, Petalostichia, or Exocyclia, containing the cake-urchins and heart-urchins, or the clypeastroids and spatangoids (respectively sometimes erected into the orders Clypeastridae and Spatangidae); together with the Paleozoic echinoids, which in some systems constitute a third order, Palaechinoidea. Also Echinoidea.

Echinolampadidae (e-ki-nō-lam-pad'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinolampas (-pad-) + -ida.] A family of irregular sea-urchins. See Cassidulidae. Also Echinolampidae.

Echinolampas (e-ki-nō-lam'pas), n. [NL., also Echinolampus; < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + λαμπτή, λαμπάς (-pad-), a torch: see lamp.] A genus of irregular sea-urchins, of the family Cassidulidae, or giving name to a family Echinolampadidae.

Echinometra (e-ki-nō-met'rā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνομετρα, the largest kind of sea-urchin, < ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + μέτρα, womb.]

Echinometra oblongata, with spines in part removed to show the plates of the test.

The typical genus of regular sea-urchins of the family Echinometridae. E. oblongata is an example.

Echinometridae (e-ki-nō-met'rī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinometra + -ida.] A family of regular desmostichous or endocyclical sea-urchins, of the order Endocyclia or Cidaridea, having a long oval shell, imperforate tubercles, oral branchiae, and ambulacral areas in arcs of more than three pairs of pores. Echinometra and Podophora are the leading genera.

Echinomyia (e-ki-nō-mī'i-ā), n. [NL. (Duméril, 1806), < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + μία, a fly.] A genus of flies, of the family Tachinidae, comprising large bristly species of a black or blackish-gray color, usually with reddish-yellow sides of the abdomen or with glistening white bands. Among them are the largest European flies of the family Muscidae in a broad sense, but none have yet been found in America. They are parasitic upon caterpillars. Also Echinomyia.

Echinomyidae (e-ki-nō-mī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinomyia + -ida.] Same as Echinomyidae.

Echinomyinae (e-ki-nō-mī'i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinomyia + -inae.] Same as Echinomyinae.

Echinomys (e-ki-nō-mis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + μῦς = E. mouse.] Same as Echinomys. Wagner, 1840.

Echinoneidae (e-ki-nō-nē'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinoneus + -ida.] A family of irregular sea-urchins, typified by the genus Echinoneus. Also written Echinonidae and Echinoneides.

Echinonemata (e-ki-nō-nē-mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + νήμα, νήμα, a thread, < νέω, spin.] A subordinal or other group of ceratosilicious sponges, having spicules of two or more kinds, there being smooth, double-pointed ones in the ceratode, and rough, single-pointed ones standing partly exposed.

Echinoneus (ek-i-nō-nē-us), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + νεός = E. new.] A genus of irregular sea-urchins, of the family Cassidulidae, or giving name to a family Echinoneidae.

echinopædia, n. Plural of echinopædium. echinopædic (e-ki-nō-pē'dik), a. [echinopædium + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the echinopædium of an echinoderm; auricularian. See Holothurioidæ.

echinopædium (e-ki-nō-pē'di-um), n.; pl. echinopædia (-iā). [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + παιδίον, dim. of παῖς (paîs), a child.] The early larval stage of an echinoderm: a name given by Huxley to the primitive generalized type-form of the Echinodermata, illustrated by the bilaterally symmetrical embryonic stage of nearly all members of that class. See the extract.

In many Echinoderms, the radial symmetry, even in the adult, is more apparent than real, inasmuch as a median plane can be found, the parts on each side of which are disposed symmetrically in relation to that plane. With a few exceptions, the embryo leaves the egg as a bilaterally symmetrical larva, provided with ciliated bands, and otherwise similar to a worm-larva, which may be termed an Echinopædium. The conversion of the Echinopædium into an Echinoderm is effected by the development of an enterocoel, and its conversion into the peritoneal cavity and the ambulacral system of veins and nerves, and by the metamorphosis of the mesoderm into radially-disposed antimeres, the result of which is the more or less complete obliteration of the primitive bilateral symmetry of the animal.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 466.

=Syn. Echinopædium, Pluteus. Echinopædium is the more general term, used by its proposer to cover any embryonic or larval stage of any echinoderm from the gastrula stage to the assumption of its specific characters. A pluteus is a special pluteiform larva of some echinoderms, as the holothurians, ophiurians, and echinids proper.

echinoplacid (e-ki-nō-plas'id), a. [Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + πλάξ (plak), anything flat, a plate, etc., + -id.] Having a circlet of spines on the madreporic plate, as a starfish; opposed to anechinoplacid.

Echinopora vesicula.

Echinopora (ek-i-nop'ō-rā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + πόρος, a passage: see pore.] The typical genus of stone-corals of the family Echinoporidae. Lamarck.

Echinoporidae (e-ki-nō-por'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinopora + -idae.] A family of stone-corals, of the order Sclerodermata, typified by the genus Echinopora.

Echinoprocta (e-ki-nō-prok'tā), n. [NL., fem. of echinoproctus: see echinoproctous.] A genus of porcupines: same as Erethizon. J. E. Gray, 1865.

echinoproctous (e-ki-nō-prok'tus), a. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + πρόκτος, the rump.] Having a spiny or prickly rump: specifically applied to porcupines of the genus Echinoprocta or Erethizon.

Echinops (e-ki-nops), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + ὤψ, face.] 1. A genus of cynaroid Composite with a thistle-like habit, remarkable for having its one-flowered heads crowded in dense terminal clusters resembling the ordinary flower-head of the order. There are about 75 species, natives of the Mediterranean region and eastward, mostly perennials. A few species are occasionally cultivated for ornament, and are known as globe-thistles.

Echinops ruthenicus.

2. A genus of Madagascar insectivorous mammals, of the family Centetidae, containing the sakinah, E. telfairi. Martin, 1838.

Echinoptilidae (e-ki-nop-til'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinoptilum + -idae.] A family of pennatulid polyps, of the section Junciformes, typified by the genus Echinoptilum, having no axis.

Echinoptilum (ek-i-nop'ti-lum), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + πτερον, a feather, wing.] The typical genus of Echinoptilidae. The type is E. macintoshii of Japan.

echinorhinid (e-ki-nō-rin'id), n. A shark of the family Echinorhinidae.

Echinorhinidae (e-ki-nō-rin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinorhinus + -idae.] A family of sharks, represented by the genus Echinorhinus. The body is very stout and surmounted by scattered thorn-like tubercles, the anal fin wanting, and the first dorsal rather nearer the pectoral than the ventral fins. Also called Echinorhinoid.

echinorhinoid (e-ki-nō-rī'noid), a. and n. [Echinorhinus + -oid.] 1. a. Of or relating to the Echinorhinidae.

II. n. An echinorhinid.

Echinorhinus (e-ki-nō-rī'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + ῥινός, skin, hide.] A genus of selachians, or sharks, typical of the family Echinorhinidae: so called because the tubercles which stud the skin bear spines; these, when detached, leave a scar. E. spinosus is the spinous shark of European, African, and American waters.

Echinorhynchidae (e-ki-nō-ring'ki-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinorhynchus + -idae.] The typical and only family of nematelmint parasitic worms of the order Acanthocephala (which see), having the sexes distinct, no oral orifice or alimentary canal, and the head consisting of a protrusile proboscis armed with hooks, whence the name. They are formidable, worm-like internal parasites, with gregarina-like embryos, becoming encysted like cestoid worms. Besides Echinorhynchus, the family contains the genus Colepea. The species are numerous.

Echinorhynchus (e-ki-nō-ring'kus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + ῥινχος, snout.] The typical genus of the family Echinorhynchidae. See cut under Acanthocephala.

The numerous species of the genus Echinorhynchus live principally in the alimentary canal of different vertebrate; the gut-wall may be as it were sown with these animals.

Claus, Zoölogy (trans.), I. 362.

In their sexual state, the parasites which constitute the genus Echinorhynchus inhabit the various classes of the Vertebrata, while they are found in the Invertebrata only in a sexless condition. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 553.

Echinosoma (e-ki-nō-sō'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, sea-urchin, + σῶμα, body.] 1. A genus of apneumonous holothurians, of the family Oncinobalidae, having filiform tentacles and five rows of tube-feet. 2. In entom.: (a) A genus of earwigs, of the family Forficulidae. Serville, 1838. (b) A genus of weevils, of the family Curculionidae, containing one Madeiran species, E. porcellus. Wollaston, 1854.

Echinostomata (e-ki-nō-stō'mā-tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + στόμα (r-), mouth.] A group of Vermes. Rudolphi.

Echinostrobus (ek-i-nos'trō-bus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + στρόβος, a twisting, < στρέφω, turn.] A fossil genus of conifers, instituted by Schimper, and closely allied to Thuya (which see), and also resembling Arthrotaxis in its foliage. They occur in the lithographic stones (Jurassic) of Solenhofen in Bavaria, and in other localities of Jurassic rocks in Europe.

Echinothuria (e-ki-nō-thū'ri-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + θύρα, dim. of θύρα = E. door.] A fossil genus of regular sea-urchins, giving name to a family Echinothuriidae.

Echinothuriidae (e-ki-nō-thū'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Echinothuria + -idae.] In Gegenbaur's system of classification, a subordinal group of desmos-tichous Echinoidea, having a movable dermal skeleton and presenting some other points of resemblance to the Asterida. The genera Echinothuria, Calveria, and Phormosoma are examples.

Echinothuriidae (e-ki'nō-thū'ri'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echinothuria + -idae.] A family of regular endocyclic or desmos-tichous sea-urchins, having the plates of the shell overlapping or movably connected by soft parts, as in the genera Asthenosoma and Phormosoma. Also written Echinothuriidae.

Echinozoa (e-ki-nō-zō'ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐχίνο, a hedgehog, + ζῷον, pl. ζῷα, an animal.] Allman's name of the series of animals which Huxley called Annuloida.

echinulate (e-kin'ū-lāt), a. [*NL. echinulus, dim. of L. echinus, a hedgehog, + -ate.] Having small prickles; minutely prickly or spiny.

echinus (e-ki'nus), n.; pl. echini (-nī). [L., < Gr. ἐχίνο, the hedgehog, urchin, prop. ἐχίνο χερσαίος, land-urchin, as distinguished from ἐχίνο πυλάγος, the sea-urchin; = Lith. carys = O Bulg. jez = AS. igil, and contr. il = D. egel = OHG. igil, MHG. G. igel = MLG. L.G. egel = Icel. igull, a hedgehog.] 1. A hedgehog. 2. A sea-urchin.

—3. [cap.] [NL.] A Linnean genus (1735), formerly used with great latitude, now the typical genus of the family Echinidae, containing such sea-urchins or sea-eggs as E. sphaera, the common British species, or the Mediterranean E. esculentus, which is extensively used for food, the ovaries being entire. The genus may be taken to exemplify not only the family to which it pertains, but the whole order of regular sea-eggs, and the class of sea-urchins itself. The shape is depressed-globose, with centric mouth and anus; the shell or test is hard, immovable, meridionally divided into five pairs of perforate plates, the plates studded with tubercles, and in life bearing movable spines. The perforate plates are the ambulacra, emitting the tube-feet. The mouth has a complicated system of plates, constituting the object known, when detached, as Aristotle's lantern (which see, under lantern). A sea-urchin is comparable to a starfish with the five arms bent upward and their ends brought together in the center over the back of the animal, and then soldered together throughout, with the modification of internal structure which such an arrangement of the parts would necessarily entail.

corresponding feature in capitals of other orders, or any molding of similar profile to the Doric echinus. Such moldings are often sculptured or painted with the egg-and-dart ornament.

In this instance the abacus is separated from the shaft; there is a bold echinus and a beaded necking; in fact, all the members of the Grecian order, only wanting the elegance which the Greeks added to it.

échiqueté (ā-shē-kē-tā'), a. [F., formerly eschiquet, formed (with prefix es-, < L. ex-), out, off, instead of des-, < L. de-), off, from déchiquet, pp. of déchiquer, divide into checks, under influence of échiquier, a checker-board: see check.] The regular OF. form is escheque: see checky.] In her., same as checky. Also written échiqueté.

Echis (ek'is), n. [NL., < Gr. ἔχis, an adder, viper, akin to L. anguis, a snake: see Anguis and anger.] A genus of Indian vipers, of the family Viperidae, including venomous solenoglyph forms of small size, having fewer ventral scutes than the African vipers, simple subcaudal scutes, imbricated carinate scales on the head, in two rows between the eyes and the labial plates, and small nostrils in a large divided nasal plate. E. carinata is a common species, 20 inches or less in length. Merrem, 1820. Called Tozicoa by Gray.

Echitonium (ek-i-tō'ni-um), n. [NL., < L. echite, a kind of clematis; or < L. echitis, Gr. ἔχitis, a kind of stone; < Gr. ἔχis, an adder, viper: see Echis.] A genus of fossil plants, instituted by Unger. The genus is phanerogamous, and is said by Schimper to be analogous to Echites of Linnaeus, an intertropical boraginaceous genus of plants occurring in Asia and America. They are found in various localities in central Europe in the Tertiary.

Echium (ek'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἔχion, a plant (Echium rubrum), < ἔχis, a viper: see Echis.] A genus of boraginaceous plants, tall hairy herbs or somewhat shrubby, natives of the old world. There are about 50 species, chiefly of the Mediterranean region and South Africa, of which the common viper's-bugloss, or blueweed, E. vulgare, with showy blue flowers, has become naturalized in some parts of the United States.

Echiuridae (ek-i-ū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Echiurus + -idae.] The leading family of Echiuroidae or chætiferous gephyreans, having the oral end of the body produced into a grooved proboscis, containing the long esophageal commissures which meet in front without ganglionic enlargement, and having on the ventral side two hooked setae anteriorly, with sometimes circles of setae posteriorly, the mouth below the proboscis at its base, and the anus terminal. The leading genera are Echiurus, Bonellia, and Thalassema. The Echiuridae are made by Lankester a class of the animal kingdom under the phylum Gephyrea.

Echiuroid (ek-i-ū'roid), a. and n. [Echiurus + -oid.] I. a. Chætiferous, as a gephyrean; or of pertaining to the Echiuroidae. II. n. A member of the Echiuroidae.

Echiuroidae (ek-i-ū'roi'dē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Echiurus + -oidea.] An order of Gephyrea, the chætiferous gephyreans. They have a terminal anus, and a mouth at the base of a preoral proboscis. The group contains the families Echiuridae and Sternaspidae, and is equivalent to a gephyrean order Chætifera.

The Echiuroidae or chætiferous gephyreae present no external segmentation of their elongated and contractile body; they have, however, in the young state, the rudiments of 15 metameres. Claus, Zoology (trans.), I. 339.

Echiurus (ek-i-ū'rus), n. [NL. (for Echidurus*), < Gr. ἔχis (ἔχid-), an adder, viper, < ὄψα, a tail.] A genus of chætophorous gephyreans (one of the group Chætiferi of Gegenbaur), armed with two strong setae on the ventral side (whence the name). The cuticle develops chitinous processes, and there is a communication between the rectum and the perivisceral cavity by means of a pair of tubular organs which are ciliated internally and at their apertures. It is the typical genus of the family Echiuridae. E. pallasi of the North Sea is an example. Also written Echirus.

Echiurus Gaerdtneri, about natural size.

echlorophyllose (ē-klō-rō-fil'ōs), a. [NL. echlorophyllosus*, < L. e- priv. + chlorophyllum, chlorophyl: see chlorophyl, < chlorophyllosus.] Without chlorophyl. Braithwaite.

[Altered (after L.) from earlier spelling; early mod. E. also echoe, echo; < ME. eccho, ekko = D. G. echo = Dan. echo, ekko = Sw. eko = OF. ego, F. echo = Sp. eco = Pg. eco, echo = It. eco, < L. echo (ML. also eccho), < Gr. ἠχώ, a sound, an echo; cf. ἠχος, ἠχη, a sound, noise, ἠχεῖν, sound, ring, etc.] 1. A sound repeated by reflection or reverberation from some obstructing surface; sound heard again at its source; repercussion of sound: as, an echo from a distant hill. Sound being produced by waves or pulses of the air, when such waves meet an opposing surface, as a wall, they are reflected like light-waves (see reflection); the sound so heard, as if originating behind the reflecting surface, is an echo. The echo of a sound returns to the point whence the sound originated if the reflecting surface is at right angles to a line drawn to it from that point. An oblique surface reflects the sound in another direction, so that it may be heard elsewhere, though not at the point where the sound originated. If the direct and reflected sounds succeed one another with great rapidity, which happens when the reflecting surface is near, the echo only clouds the original sound, but is not heard distinctly; and it is such indistinct echoes that interfere with the hearing in churches and other large buildings. An interval of about one ninth of a second is necessary to discriminate two successive sounds; and as sound passes through the atmosphere at the rate of about 1,125 feet in a second, $\frac{1}{9}$ of 1,125, or about 62 feet, will be the least distance at which an echo can be heard; and this will be distinct only in the case of a sharp, sudden sound. The walls of a house or the ramparts of a city, the surface of a cloud, a wood, rocks, mountains, and valleys produce echoes. Some echoes are remarkable for their frequency of repetition, and are called multiple or tautological echoes.

Folweth Ekko, that holdeth no silence,
But ever answereth at the countertail.
Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, l. 1132.

The babbling echo mocks the hounds,
Replying shrilly to the well-tun'd horns,
As if a double hunt were heard at once.
Shak., Tit. And., ii. 3.

The Scriptures are God's voice; the church is his echo, a redoubling, a repeating of some particular syllables and accents of the same voice. Donne, Sermons, xiv.

Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying, dying.
Tennyson, Princess, iii. (song).

2. [cap.] In classical myth., an oread or mountain nymph, who, according to a usual form of the myth, pined away for love of the beautiful youth Narcissus till nothing remained of her but her voice.

Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen Within thy airy shell.
Milton, Comus, l. 230.

3. Figuratively, a repetition of the sentiments of others; reproduction of the ideas or opinions of others, either in speech or in writing.

It is the folly of too many to mistake the echo of a London coffeehouse for the voice of the kingdom.
Swift, Conduct of the Allies.

4. In music, the very soft repetition of a short phrase, particularly in orchestral or organ music. In large organs an echo-organ is sometimes provided for echo-like effects; it consists of pipes shut up in a tight box, or removed to a distance from the organ proper, and controlled by a separate keyboard or by separate stops. A single stop so used or placed is called an echo-stop.

5. In arch., a wall or vault, etc., having the property of reflecting sounds or of producing an echo.—6. [cap.] [NL.] In zoöl., a genus of neuropterous insects. Selys, 1853.—To the echo, so as to produce a reverberation of sound; hence, loudly; vehemently; so as to excite attention and response: chiefly used with applaud or similar words.

I would applaud thee to the very echo,
That would applaud again.
Shak., Macbeth, v. 3.

echo (ek'ō), v. [echo, n.] I. intrans. 1. To emit an echo; reflect or repeat sound; give forth an answering sound by or as if by echo.

And kiss'd her lips with such a clamorous smack,
That, at the parting, all the church did echo.
Shak., T. of the S., ii. 2.

Lord, as I am, I have no pow'r at all,
To hear thy voice, or echo to thy call.
Quarles, Emblems, iv. 8.

How often from the steep
Of echoing hill or thicket have we heard Celestial voices.
Milton, P. L., iv. 681.

2. To be reflected or repeated by or as if by echo; return or be conveyed to the ear in repetition; pass along by reverberation.

Her mitred princes hear the echoing noise,
And, Albion, dread thy wrath and awful voice.
Sir R. Blackmore.

Sounds which echo further west
Than your sires' "Islands of the Blest."
Byron, Don Juan, iii. 86.

In the midst of echoing and re-echoing voices of thanksgiving.
D. Webster, Adams and Jefferson.

3. To produce a reverberating sound; give out a loud sound.

Drums and trumpets echo loudly,
Wave the crimson banners proudly.
Longfellow, The Black Knight (trans.).

II. trans. 1. To emit an echo of; reflect the sound of, either directly or obliquely; cause to be heard by reverberation: as, the whispering gallery of St. Paul's in London echoes very faint sounds.

Never [more shall] the black and dripping precipices Echo her stormy scream as she sails by.
M. Arnold, Sohrab and Rustum.

2. To repeat as if by way of echo; emit a reproduction of, as sounds, words, or sentiments; imitate the sound or significance of.

Then gan triumphant Trompets sound on hie,
That sent to heaven the echoed report
Of their new joy, and happy victory.
Spenser, F. Q., I. xii. 4.

Those peals are echoed by the Trojan throng.
Dryden, Æneid.

The whole nation was echoing his verse, and crowded theatres were applauding his wit and humour.

I. D'Israeli, Calam. of Authors, I. 159.

They would have echoed the praises of the men whom they envied, and then have sent to the newspapers libels upon them.
Macaulay.

3. To imitate as an echo; repeat or reproduce the sounds, utterances, or sentiments of: as, the mocking-bird echoes nearly all other creatures; to echo a popular author.

And the true art for . . . popular display is—to contrive the best forms for appearing to say something new, when in reality you are but echoing yourself.

De Quincy, Style, I.

echoer (ek'ō-ēr), n. One who echoes.

Followers and echoers of other men.
W. Howitt, Visits to Remarkable Places (Amer. ed., 1842), [p. 131].

echoic (ek'ō-ik), a. [= Sp. ecóico = Pg. echoico, < L. echoicus, echoing, riming (of verses), < L. echo, echo: see echo.] Pertaining to or formed by echoism; onomatopoeic. See extract under echoism.

echoical (e-kō'i-kal), a. [echoic + -al.] Having the nature of an echo. Nares. [Rare.]

An echoical verse, wherein the sound of the last syllable doth agree with the last save one, as in an echo.
Nomenclator.

echoism (ek'ō-izm), n. [echo + -ism.] In philol., the formation of words by the echoing or imitation of natural sounds, as those caused by the motion of objects, as buzz, whizz, or the characteristic cries of animals, as cuckoo, chickadee, whip-poor-will, etc.; onomatopoeia. [Recent.]

Onomatopoeia, in addition to its awkwardness, has neither associative nor etymological application to words imitating sounds. It means word-making or word-coining, and is as strictly applicable to Comte's altruisme as to cuckoo. Echotism suggests the echoing of a sound heard, and has the useful derivatives echoist, echoize, and echoic, instead of onomatopoeic, which is not only unmanageable, but, when applied to words like cuckoo, crack, erroneous; it is the voice of the cuckoo, the sharp sound of breaking, which is onomatopoeic or word-creating, not the echoic words which they create.

J. A. H. Murray, 9th Ann. Address to Philol. Soc.

echoist (ek'ō-ist), n. [echo + -ist.] One who forms words by the imitation or echoing of sounds. See echoism. [Recent.]

echoize (ek'ō-iz), v. i.; pret. and pp. echoized, ppr. echoizing. [echo + -ize.] To form words by echoing or imitating sounds. See echoism. [Recent.]

echolalia (ek-ō-lā'li-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἠχώ, an echo, < λαλέω, babbling, < λαλέω, babble.] In pathol., the repetition by the patient in a meaningless way of words and phrases addressed to him. It occurs in certain nervous disorders.

echoless (ek'ō-less), a. [echo + -less.] Giving or yielding no echo; calling forth no response.

Its voice is echoless. Byron, Prometheus.

echometer (e-kom'e-tēr), n. [= F. écomètre = Sp. ecómetro = Pg. echometro = It. ecometro, < Gr. ἠχώ, echo, < μέτρον, a measure.] In physics, an instrument for measuring the duration, the intervals, and the mutual relation of sounds.

echometry (e-kom'e-tri), n. [= F. écométrie = Sp. ecometría = Pg. echometria = It. ecometría; as echometer + -y.] 1. The art or act of measuring the duration, etc., of sounds.—2. In arch., the art of constructing buildings in conformity with the principles of acoustics.

echoscope (ek'ō-skōp), n. [Gr. ἠχώ, sound, echo, < σκοπεῖν, view.] A stethoscope.

echo-stop (ek'ō-stop), n. See echo, 4.

Echymys, n. An erroneous form of *Echimy*s. Wiegmann, 1838.

Eciton (es'i-ton), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1804); formation not obvious.] A genus of ants called

foraging or army ants, usually placed in the family Myrmicidae, as the petiole of the abdomen has two nodes. It is now supposed that the genus Labidus, of the family Dorylidae, is represented exclusively by the males of Eciton, and the characters of both groups require revision. These ants are found in South and Central America, and 3 species of Eciton and 6 of Labidus are known in the United States, from Utah, New Mexico, California, and Texas. There are two kinds of neuters or workers, large-headed and small-headed, the former of which are called soldiers. They are carnivorous, march in vast numbers, and are very destructive.

eckle¹, eccle (ek'l), n. [E. dial., also ecce, var. of ickel, ult. < AS. gicel, an icicle: see ickel, icicle.] 1. An icicle.—2. pl. The crest of a cock.—To build eccks in the air, to build castles in the air. Wright. [Prov. Eng. in all uses.]

eckle² (ek'l), n. [E. dial. Cf. eckle¹.] A woodpecker. [Prov. Eng.]

eckle³, v. i.; pret. and pp. eckled, ppr. eckling. [A dial. var. of etle.] To aim; intend; design. Halliwell. [North. Eng.]

éclair (ā-k'lār'), n. [F., lit. lightning, < éclairer, lighten, illumine, < L. exclarare, light up, < ex, out, + clarare, make bright or clear: see clear, v.] A small oblong cake, filled with a cream or custard, and glazed with chocolate or sugar.

éclaircise, v. t. See éclaircir.

éclaircissement (ā-k'lār-sēs'mōn), n. [F. (=Pr. esclarizement = Sp. esclarecimiento = Pg. esclarecimento), < éclaircir, clear up: see éclaircir.] Explanation; the clearing up of something not before understood.

Nay, madam, you shall stay . . . till he has made an éclaircissement of his love to you.

Wycherley, Country Wife.

Next morning I breakfasted alone with Mr. Walpole; when we had all the éclaircissement I ever expected, and I left him far better satisfied than I had been hitherto.

Gray, Letters, I. 124.

éclaircize (ē-k'lār'siz), v. t.; pret. and pp. éclaircized, ppr. éclaircizing. [< F. éclaircir, stem of certain parts of éclaircir (= Pr. esclarzir, esclarzezir = Sp. Pg. esclarecer), clear up; with suffix, ult. < L. escere (see -escere, -ish²), < éclairer, lighten, illumine: see éclair.] To make clear; explain; clear up, as something not understood or misunderstood. Also spelled éclaircise. [Rare.]

ecclampsia (ek-lamp'si-ā), n. [= F. éclampsie = It. ecclampsia, < NL. ecclampsia, < Gr. ἐκλάμψις, a shining forth, exceeding brightness, < ἐκλάμπεω, shine forth, < ek, forth, + λάμπεω, shine: see lamp.] In pathol., a flashing of light before the eyes; also, rapid convulsive motions. The name is applied to convulsions resembling those of epilepsy, but not of true epilepsy: as, the ecclampsia of childbirth. Also ecclampsy.

ecclampsic (ek-lamp'sik), a. A less correct form of ecclampsic.

ecclampsy (ek-lamp'si), n. Same as ecclampsia.
ecclampitic (ek-lamp'tik), a. [= F. éclampitique; as ecclampsia (ecclamp¹) + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of ecclampsia: as, ecclampitic convulsions; ecclampitic idiocy.—2. Suffering from ecclampsia: as, an ecclampitic patient.

éclat (ā-k'lā'), n. [F., < éclater, burst forth, < OF. esclater, shine, < esclater, burst, < OHG. slāzan, MHG. slāzen, split, burst, G. schleissen = AS. slātan, E. slit, q. v.] 1. A burst, as of applause; acclamation; approbation: as, his speech was received with great éclat.—2. Brilliant effect; brilliancy of success; splendor; magnificence: as, the éclat of a great achievement.

Although we have taken formal possession of Burmah with much éclat, the dangers and difficulties of the enterprise are by no means at an end.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 288.

3. Renown; glory.

Yet the éclat it gave was enough to turn the head of a man less presumptuous than Egmont.

Prescott.

eclectic (ek-lek'tik), a. and n. [= F. éclectique = Sp. eclectico = Pg. eclectico = It. eclettico (cf. G. eklektisch = Dan. eklektisk), < NL. eclecticus, < Gr. ἐκλεκτικός, picking out, selecting, < ἐκλεγε, picked out, < ἐκλέγειν, pick out (= L. eligere, pp. electus, > E. elect, q. v.), < ek, out, + legein, pick, choose: see legend.] 1. a. Selecting; choosing; not confined to or following any one model or system, but selecting and appropriating whatever is considered best in all.

The American mind, in the largest sense eclectic, struggled for universality, while it asserted freedom.

Bancroft, Hist. U. S., II. 464.

When not creative, their genius has been eclectic and refining.

Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 23.

Eclectic medicine, a medical theory and practice based upon selection of what is esteemed best in all systems; specifically, the medical system of a separately organized school of physicians in the United States, who make much use of what they regard as specific remedies, largely or chiefly botanical.—Eclectic physician. (a) One of an ancient order of physicians, supposed to have been founded by Agathinus of Sparta. (b) A practitioner of the American school of eclectic medicine.

II. n. One who, in whatever department of knowledge, not being convinced of the fundamental principles of any existing system, culls from the teachings of different schools such doctrines as seem to him probably true, conformable to good sense, wholesome in practice, or recommended by other secondary considerations; one who holds that opposing schools are right in their distinctive doctrines, wrong only in their opposition to one another. In philosophy the chief groups of eclectics have been—(1) those ancient writers, from the first century before Christ, who, like Cicero, influenced by Platonic skepticism, held a composite doctrine of ethics, logic, etc., aggregated of Platonist, Peripatetic, Stoic, and even Epicurean elements; (2) writers in the seventeenth century who, like Leibnitz, mingled Aristotelian and Cartesian principles; (3) writers in the eighteenth century who adopted in part the views of Leibnitz, in part those of Locke; (4) Schelling and others, who held beliefs derived from various idealistic, pantheistic, and mystical philosophies; (5) the school of Cousin, who took a mean position between a philosophy of experience and one of absolute reason.

Even the eclectics, who arose about the age of Augustus, . . . were . . . as slavish and dependent as any of their brethren, since they sought for truth not in nature, but in the several schools.

Hume, Rise of Arts and Sciences.

My notion of an eclectic is a man who, without foregone conclusions of any sort, deliberately surveys all accessible modes of thought, and chooses from each his own "hortus siccus" of definitive convictions.

J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, II. 331.

Specifically—(a) A follower of the ancient eclectic philosophy. (b) In the early church, a Christian who believed the doctrine of Plato to be conformable to the spirit of the gospel. (c) In med., a practitioner of eclectic medicine, either ancient or modern; an eclectic physician.

eclectically (ek-lek'ti-kāl-i), adv. By way of choosing or selecting; in the manner of the eclectic philosophers or physicians; as an eclectic.

eclecticism (ek-lek'ti-sizm), n. [= F. éclecticisme; as eclectic + -ism.] The method of the eclectics, or a system, as of philosophy, medicine, etc., made up of selections from various systems.

Sensualism, idealism, skepticism, mysticism, are all partial and exclusive views of the elements of intelligence. But each is false only as it is incomplete. They are all true in what they affirm, all erroneous in what they deny. Though hitherto opposed, they are, consequently, not incapable of coalition; and, in fact, can only obtain their consummation in a powerful eclecticism—a system which shall comprehend them all.

Sir W. Hamilton, Edinburgh Rev., I. 201.

eclectism (ek-lek'tizm), n. [F. éclectisme = Pg. eclectismo, < Gr. ἐκλεκτός, picked out: see eclectic and -ism.] Same as eclecticism. [Rare.]

The classicists, indeed, argue for that eclecticism of taste which finds suggestive material wherever there is force and beauty.

D. G. Mitchell, Bound Together, iv.

Eclectus (ek-lek'tus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκλεκτός, picked out, select: see eclectic.] 1. A genus of trichoglossine parrots related to the lories, containing several species of the Philippine, Malaccan, and Papuan islands, as E. linnæi, E. polychlorus, etc.—2. [l. c.] A parrot of the genus Eclectus.

eclegm (ek-lem'), n. [Prop. eclegm*; = F. éclegme, éclegme, < L. eclegma, < Gr. ἐκλεγμα, an electuary, < ἐκλέγειν, lick up, < ek, out, + λέγειν, lick. Cf. electuary, from the same ult. source.] A medicine of syrupy consistency.

eclimeter (ek-lim'e-tēr), n. An instrument to be held in the hand for measuring the zenith distances of objects near the horizon.

eclipse (ē-klips'), n. [ME. eclyps (more frequent in the abbr. form clips, clippes, clippus, etc.: see clips), < OF. eclypse, F. éclipse = Pr. eclypsis, eclypsse, eclyps = Sp. Pg. eclipse = It. eclisse, eclisse, ecclissi, < L. eclypsis, < Gr. ἐκλειψις, an eclipse, lit. a failing, forsaking, < ἐκλείπειν, leave off, cease, suffer an eclipse, < ek, out, + λείπειν, leave.] 1. In astron., an interception or obscuration of the light of the sun, moon, or other heavenly body, by the intervention of another heavenly body either between it and the eye or between it and the source of its illumination. An eclipse of the sun is caused by the intervention of the moon between it and the earth, the sun's disk being thus partially or entirely hidden; an eclipse of the moon is occasioned by the earth passing between it and the sun, the earth's shadow obscuring the whole or part of its surface, but never entirely concealing it. The number of eclipses of the sun and moon cannot be fewer than two nor more than seven in one year, exclusive of penumbral eclipses of the moon. The most usual number is four, seven being very rare. Jupiter's satellites are eclipsed by passing through his shadow. See occultation.

For it shal chaungen wonder soone,
And take eclyps right as the moone,
Whanne he is from us i-lett
Thurgh erthe, that bitwixe is sett
The sonne and hir, as it may falle,
Be it in partie or in alle.

Rom. of the Rose, I. 5387.

But in y^e first watch of y^e night, the moone suffred eclyps.

J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, fol. 78.

The sun . . . from behind the moon,
In dim eclyps, disastrous twilight sheds
On half the nations, or with fear of change Perplexes monarchs.

Milton, P. L., i. 597.

As when the sun, a crescent of eclyps,
Dreams over lake and lawn, and isles and capes.

Tennyson, Vision of Sin, I.

2. Figuratively, any state of obscurity; an overshadowing; a transition from brightness, clearness, or animation to the opposite state: as, his glory has suffered an eclipse.

All the posterity of our first parents suffered a perpetual eclipse of spiritual life.

Raleigh, Hist. World.

Gayety without eclyps

Wearieth me.

Tennyson, Lillian.

How like the starless night of death
Our being's brief eclyps,
When faltering heart and failing breath
Have bleached the fading lips!

O. W. Holmes, Agnes.

He [Earl Hakon] was zealous, in season and out of season, to bring back those who in that eclyps of the old faith had either gone over to Christianity or preferred to "trust in themselves," to what he considered the true fold.

Edinburgh Rev.

Annular, central, partial, penumbral, total eclipse. See the adjectives.—Eclipse of a satellite, the obscuration of it by the shadow of its primary: opposed to an occultation, in which it is hidden by the body of the primary.—Eclipse of Thales, a total eclipse of the sun which took place 585 B. C., May 28th, during a battle between the Medes and the Lydians, and which is stated to have been predicted by Thales of Miletus.—Quantity of an eclipse, the number of digits eclipsed. See digit, s.—eclipse (ē-klips'), v.; pret. and pp. eclipsed, ppr. eclipsing. [ME. eclypsen, < OF. eclypsier, F. éclipsier = Pr. Sp. Pg. eclypsar = It. eclissare, eclissare; from the noun.] 1. trans. 1. To obscure by an eclipse; cause the obscuration of; darken or hide, as a heavenly body: as, the moon eclipses the sun.

Within these two hundred years found out it was . . . that the moon sometime was eclipsed twice in five months space, and the sunne likewise in seven.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, ii. 9.

2. To overshadow; throw in the shade; obscure; hence, to surpass or excel.

Though you have all this worth, you hold some qualities That do eclipse your virtues.

Beau. and Fl., King and No King, i. 1.

Another now hath to himself engross'd
All power, and us eclipsed.

Milton, P. L., v. 776.

When he [Christ] was lifted up [to his cross], he did there crucify the world, and the things of it, eclipse the lustre, and destroy the power, of all its empty vanities.

By. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xviii.

I, therefore, for the moment, omit all inquiry how far the Mariolatry of the early Church did indeed eclipse Christ.

Ruskin.

II. intrans. To suffer an eclipse. [Rare.]

The labouring moon

Eclipses at their charms.

Milton, P. L., ii. 666.

eclyptic (ē-kliptik'), a. and n. [Formerly eclyptick; = F. écliptique = Pg. eclyptico = It. eclettico, < LL. eclypticus, < LGr. ἐκλειπτικός, of or caused by an eclipse (as a noun, = F. écliptique = Sp. eclyptica = Pg. eclyptica = It. eclettica, < LL. eclyptica (sc. linea, line), < Gr. ἐκλειπτικός (sc. κύκλος, circle), the line or circle in the plane of which eclipses take place), < ἐκλείπειν, an eclipse: see eclipse, n.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to an eclipse.—2. Pertaining to the apparent path of the sun in the heavens: as, eclyptic constellations.

Thy full face in his oblique designe
Confronting Phoebus in the Eclyptic line, And th' Earth between.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 4.

Eclyptic conjunction, a conjunction in longitude of the moon with the sun, the former being within its eclyptic limits.—Eclyptic digit, one twelfth part of the sun's or moon's diameter, used as a unit in expressing the quantity of eclipses.—Eclyptic limits, the greatest distances at which the moon can be from her nodes (that is, from the eclyptic), if an eclipse of the sun or moon is to happen.

II. n. 1. In astron., a great circle of the heavens in the plane of the earth's orbit, or that of the apparent annual motion of the sun among the stars. The fixed eclyptic is the position of the eclyptic at any given date. The mean eclyptic is the position of the fixed eclyptic relative to the equinoctial, as modified by precession. This is now approaching the equinoctial at the rate of 47" per century. The true or apparent eclyptic is the mean eclyptic as modified by the effects of nutation. The obliquity of the eclyptic is the inclination of the ecliptic to the equinoctial. Its mean value for A. D. 1900 is 23° 27' 8".

Satan . . .
Took leave; and toward the coast of earth beneath, Down from the ecliptic sped. Milton, P. L., iii. 740.

My lady's Indian kinsman, unannounced,
With half a score of swarthy faces came.
His own, tho' keen and bold and soldierly,
Sear'd by the close ecliptic, was not fair.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

2. A great circle drawn upon a terrestrial globe, tangent to the tropics. It is sometimes said to "mark the sun's annual path across the surface of the earth"; but since its plane is represented as fixed upon the earth, the rotation of the latter will give it a gyratory motion in-compatible with its representing any celestial appearance. It may, however, prove convenient when a terrestrial globe is used instead of a celestial one.

eclog, n. An abbreviated spelling of eclogue.
eclogite (ek' lō-jīt), n. [Gr. ἐκλογος, picked out (ἐκλέγειν, pick out, choose), + -ite.] The name given by Häuy to a rock consisting of a crystalline-granular aggregate of omphacite (a granular, grass-green variety of pyroxene) with red garnet. With these essential constituents cyanite (disthene) is often associated, and, less commonly, silvery mica, quartz, and pyrites. This is one of the most beautiful of rocks, and of rather rare occurrence. It is found in the Alps, in the Fichtelgebirge in Bavaria, in the Erzgebirge in Bohemia, and also in Norway. It occurs in lenticular masses in the older gneisses and schists. To the variety occurring at Syra in Greece, consisting largely of cyanite or disthene, the name ecyanite rock or disthene rock has been given. Also spelled eklogite.

eclogue (ek' lōg), n. [Early mod. E. also eclog, and eclogue, æglogue; = F. églogue, eclogue, now églogue, éclogue = Sp. ecloga = Pg. egloga = It. egloga, ecloga = G. ekloge = Dan. Sw. eklog, < L. ecloga, < Gr. ἐκλογία, a selection, esp. of poems, "elegant extracts" (cf. ἐκλογος, picked out), < ἐκλέγειν, pick out, select, < ἐκ, out, + λέγειν, pick, choose; cf. eclectic. The term came to be applied esp. to a collection of pastoral poems (with special ref. to Virgil's pastoral poems (Bucolica), which were published under the title of Eclogæ, 'selections'), whence the false spellings eglogue, æglogue (F. églogue, etc.), in an endeavor to bring in the pastoral associations of Gr. αἶξ (ai-'), a goat.] In poetry, a pastoral composition, in which shepherds are introduced conversing with one another; a bucolic: as, the eclogues of Virgil.

Some be of opinion, and the chiefs of those who have written in this art among the Latines, that the pastoral Poesie which we commonly call by the name of Eglogue and Bucolic, a term brought in by the Sicilian Poets, should be the first of any other.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 30.

eclosion (ē-klēō' zhōn), n. [F. éclosion, < éclos, stem of certain parts of éclore, emerge from the egg, < L. excludere, shut out: see excluide, exclusion, and cf. *close*¹, *close*².] The act of emerging from a covering or concealment; specifically, in entom., the escape of an insect from the pupa- or chrysalis-case.

J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 245.

5. Characterized by freedom from wastefulness, extravagance, or excess; frugal; saving; sparing: as, economic use of money or of material. [In this sense more commonly economical.]

The charitable few are chiefly they Whom Fortune places in the middle way;
Just rich enough, with economic care,
To save a pittance, and a pittance spare.

Harte, Eulogius.

= Syn. 5. Saving, sparing, careful, thrifty, provident.
economical (ē-kō- or ek-ō-nom' i-kal), a. [Ekonomik + -al.] Same as economic. The form economical is more common than economic in sense 5.

This economical misfortune [of ill-assorted matrimony].
Milton, Divorce.

There was no economic distress in England to prompt the enterprises of colonization.
Palfrey.

But the economical and moral causes that were destroying agriculture in Italy were too strong to be resisted.
Lecky, Europ. Morals, i. 284.

The life of the well-off people is graceful, pretty, daintily-ordered, hospitable; but it has a simplicity which incidentally makes it comparatively economical.

Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 68.

economically (ē-kō- or ek-ō-nom' i-kal-i), adv. 1. As regards the production, distribution, and use of wealth; as regards the means by which human needs and comforts are supplied.—2. With economy; with frugality or moderation.

economics (ē-kō- or ek-ō-nom' iks), n. [Formerly also æconomics; pl. of economic (see -ics), after Gr. τὰ οἰκονομικά, neut. pl. (also fem. sing. ἡ οἰκονομική, sc. τέχνη, art), the art of household management.] 1. The science of household or domestic management. [Obsolete or archaic].—2. The science which treats of wealth, its production, distribution, etc.; political economy.

The best authors have chosen rather to handle it [education] in their politics than in their economics.

Sir H. Watton, Reliquis, p. 78.

Not only in science, but in politics and economics, in the less splendid arts which administer to convenience and enjoyment, much information may be derived, by careful search, from times which have been in general neglected, as affording nothing to repay the labour of attention.
V. Knox, Essays, No. 78.

Among minor alterations, I may mention the substitution for the name of Political Economy of the single convenient term Economics. Jevons, Pol. Econ. (2d ed.), Pref.

economisation, economise, etc. See economization, etc.

economist (ē-kon' ō-mist), n. [Formerly also æconomist; = F. économiste = Sp. Pg. It. economista; as economy + -ist.] 1. One who manages pecuniary or other resources; a manager in general, with reference to means and expenditure or outlay.

Very few people are good economists of their fortune, and still fewer of their time. Chesterfield, Letters, ccxvi.

It would be . . . madness to expect happiness from one who has been so very bad an economist of his own.
Goldsmith, Vicar, xiii.

Ferdinand was too severe an economist of time to waste it willingly on idle pomp and ceremonial.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 19.

Specifically.—2. A careful or prudent manager of pecuniary means; one who practises frugality in expenditure: as, he has the reputation of being an economist; he is a rigid economist.

—3. One versed in economics, or the science of political economy.

So well known an English economist as Malthus has also shown in a few lines his complete appreciation of the mathematical nature of economic questions.

Jevons, Pol. Econ. (2d ed.), Pref.

4. An officer in some cathedrals of the Church of Ireland who is appointed by the chapter to manage the cathedral fund, to see to the necessary repairs, pay the church officers, etc.—

Fain. He keeps open house for all comers.

Wid. He ought to be very rich, whose economy is so profuse.
Mrs. Centlivre, The Artifice, iv.

Hence.—2. A frugal and judicious use of money, material, time, etc.; the avoidance of or freedom from waste or extravagance in the management or use of anything; frugality in the expenditure or consumption of money, materials, etc.

I have no other notion of economy than that it is the parent of liberty and ease. Swift, To Lord Bolingbroke.

Nature, with a perfect economy, turns all forces to account.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 388.

Another principle that serves to throw light on our inquiry is that which has been called the principle of economy, viz., that an effect is pleasing in proportion as it is attained by little effort and simple means.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 70.

3. Management, order, or arrangement in general; the disposition or regulation of the parts or functions of any organic whole; an organized system or method: as, the internal economy of a nation; the economy of the work is out of joint.

This economy must be observed in the minutest parts of an epic poem.
Dryden, Æneid, Ded.

If we rightly examine things, we shall find that there is a sort of economy in providence, that one shall excel where another is defective, in order to make men more useful to each other, and mix them in society.

Steele, Tatler, No. 92.

Specifically.—(a) The provisions of nature for the generation, nutrition, and preservation of animals and plants; the regular, harmonious system in accordance with which the functions of living animals and plants are performed: as, the animal economy; the vegetable economy.

He who hunts
Or harms them there is guilty of a wrong,
Disturbs the economy of nature's realm.
Cowper, Task, vi. 577.

If we forget, for an instant, that each species tends to increase inordinately, and that some check is always in action, yet seldom perceived by us, the whole economy of Nature will be utterly obscured.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 303.

(b) The functional organization of a living body: as, his internal economy is badly deranged.

It is necessary to banish from the mind the idea that we live literally besieged by organisms always ready to sow putrefaction on the mucous tract of our economies.

Science, III. 520.

(c) The regulation and disposition of the internal affairs of a state or nation, or of any department of government.

The Jews already had a Sabbath, which as citizens and subjects of that economy they were obliged to keep, and did keep.

Paley.

The theatre was by no means so essential a part of the economy of a Roman city as it was of a Grecian one.

J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 323.

4t. Management; control. [Rare.]

I shall never recompose my Features, to receive Sir Rowland with any Economy of Face.

Congreve, Way of the World, iii. 5.

Domestic economy. See domestic.—Economy of grace. See grace.—Political economy. See political.—Syn. 2. Frugality, Economy, Thrift. Frugality saves by avoiding both waste and needless expense; its central idea is that of saving. Economy goes further, and includes prudent management: as, economy of time. Thrift is a stronger word for economy; it is a smart, ambitious, and successful economy.

Lucullus, when frugality could charm,
Had roasted turnips in the Sabine farm.

Pope, Moral Essays, i. 218.

Strict economy enabled him [Frederic William] to keep up a peace establishment of sixty thousand troops.

Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

Thrift, thrift, Horatio! the funeral bak'd meats
Did coldly furnish forth the marriage tables.

Shak., Hamlet, i. 2.

ecstasize (ek'stā-siz), v. t.; pret. and pp. ecstasized, ppr. ecstasizing. [Ecstasy + -ize.] To fill with ecstasy or excessive joy. F. Butler. [Rare.]

Rose and Margaret burst from their retreat with a loud laugh, and gave Obed a hearty greeting; which he, bemazed and ecstasized, returned as handsomely as he knew how.

S. Judd, Margaret, ii. 11.

ecstasy (ek'stā-si), n.; pl. ecstasies (-siz). [Formerly spelled variously ecstasie, ecstacy, ecstasy, extasie, etc.; = F. extase = Sp. extasi, extasis = Pg. extasis = It. estasi (D. extase = G. ekstase = Dan. extase = Sw. extas, (F.), < LL. ecstasis, ML. also extasis, < Gr. ἐκστασις, any displacement or removal from the proper place, a standing aside, distraction of mind, astonishment, later a trance, < ἐκσταίνω, 2d. aor. ἐκστήναι, put or place aside, mid. and pass. stand aside, < ἐξ, ek, out, + ιστάναι, place, set, ιστάναι, stand: see stasis.] 1. A state in which the mind is exalted or liberated as it were from the body; a state in which the functions of the senses are suspended by the contemplation of some extraordinary or supernatural object, or by absorption in some overpowering idea, most frequently of a religious nature; entrancing rapture or transport.

Whether what we call ecstasy be not dreaming with our eyes open, I leave to be examined.

Locke.

When the mind is warmed with heavenly thoughts, and wrought up into some degrees of holy ecstasy, it stays not there, but communicates these impressions to the body.

Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xix.

The Neoplatonists, though they sometimes spoke of civic virtues, regarded the condition of ecstasy as not only transcending but including all, and that condition could only be arrived at by a passive life.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 350.

2. Overpowering emotion or exaltation, in which the mind is absorbed and the actions are controlled by the exciting subject; a sudden access of intense feeling. Specifically—(a) Joyful, delightful, or rapturous emotion; extravagant delight: as, the ecstasy of love; he gazed upon the scene with ecstasy.

He on the tender grass

Would sit, and hearken ev'n to ecstasy.
Milton, Comus, I. 625.

Sweet thankful love his soul did fill

With utter ecstasy of bliss.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 84.

It is a sky of Italian April, full of sunshine and the hidden ecstasy of larks.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 191.

The ecstasies of mirth and terror which his gestures and play of countenance never failed to produce in a nursery flattered him [Garrick] quite as much as the applause of mature critics.

Macaulay, Madame d'Arbigny.

(b) Grievous, fearful, or painful emotion; extreme agitation; distraction: as, the very ecstasy of grief; an ecstasy of fear.

Better be with the dead . . .

Than on the torture of the mind to lie

In restless ecstasy.
Shak., Macbeth, iii. 2.

Come, let us leave him in his ireful mood,

Our words will but increase his ecstasy.

Marioue, Jew of Malta, i. 2.

And last, the cannons' voice that shook the skies,

And, as it fares in sudden ecstasies,

At once bereft us both of ears and eyes.

Dryden, Astrea Redux, I. 228.

3. In med., a morbid state of the nervous system, allied to catalepsy and trance, in which the patient assumes the attitude and expression of rapture. Also ecstasis.—4. Insanity; madness.

That noble and most sovereign rapture;

Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh;

That unmatch'd form and feature of blown youth,

Blasted with ecstasy.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 1.

ecstasy (ek'stā-si), v. t.; pret. and pp. ecstasied, ppr. ecstasying. [Ecstasy, n.] To fill with rapture or enthusiasm. [Rare.]

The persons . . . then made prophetic and inspired must needs have discoursed like saphirims and the most ecstasied order of intelligences.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 31.

They were so ecstasied with joy that they made the heavens ring with triumphant shouts and acclamations.

J. Scott, Christian Life, I. iv. § 5.

ecstatic (ek-stat'ik), a. and n. [Formerly ecstatick, extatick; = F. extatique = Sp. extático = Pg. extático = It. estatico, < Gr. ἐκστατικός, < ἐκστασις, ecstasy: see ecstasy.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or resulting from ecstasy; entrancing; overpowering.

In pensive trance, and anguish, and ecstatic fit.

Milton, The Passion, l. 42.

To gain Pescennius one employs his schemes;

One grasps a Cecrops in ecstatic dreams.

Pope, To Addison.

The Sonnets (Mrs. Browning's) reveal to us that Love which is the most ecstatic of human emotions and worth all other gifts in life. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 138.

2. Affected by ecstasy; enraptured; entranced.

By making no responses to ordinary stimuli, the ecstatic subject shows that he is "not himself."

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 77.

II. n. 1. One subject to ecstasies or raptures; an extravagant enthusiast. [Rare.]

Old Heretics and idle Ecstatics, such as the very primitive times were infinitely pestered withal.

Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 201.

2. pl. Ecstasy; rapturous emotion.

ecstatical (ek-stat'i-kal), a. [Formerly extatic; < ecstatic + -al.] Same as ecstatic.

With other extatic furies, and religious frenzies, with ornaments of gold and jewels. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 66.

ecstatically (ek-stat'i-kal-i), adv. In an ecstatic manner; rapturously; ravishingly.

ectad (ek'tad), adv. [< Gr. ἐκτός, without, outside, + -ad, < L. ad, to.] In anat., to or toward the outside or exterior; outward; outwardly.

The dura mater may be described as ectad of the brain, but entad of the cranium.

Wüder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 27.

ectal (ek'tal), a. [< Gr. ἐκτός, without, + -al.] In anat., outer; external; superficial; peripheral: opposed to ental.

The suggestion to employ ental and ectal was welcomed, and they were published [by Wüder in 1831].

Wüder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 27.

ectasia (ek-tā'si-ä), n. [NL.: see ectasis.] 1. Ectasis.—2. Aneurism. —Alveolar ectasia. Same as vesicular emphysema (which see, under emphysema).

ectasis (ek'tā-sis), n. [LL., < Gr. ἐκτασις, extension, < ἐκτείνω (= L. extendere, extend, < ἐκ, out, + τείνω, stretch: see extend, tend.)] 1.

In anc. orthoëpy and pros.: (a) The pronunciation of a vowel as long. (b) The lengthening or protraction of a vowel usually short. See diastole.—2. In anc. rhet.: (a) The use of a long vowel or syllable in a part of a clause or sentence where it will produce a special rhythmical effect. (b) The use of a form of a word longer than that commonly employed. This is generally called paragoge.

ectaster (ek-tas'tēr), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, without, + ἀστήρ, star.] A kind of sponge-spicule. Sollas.

ectatic (ek-tat'ik), a. [< Gr. ἐκτατικός, capable of extension, < ἐκτείνω, extend: see ectasis.] Exhibiting or pertaining to ectasis.

ectene, ectenes (ek'te-nēz), n. [< Gr. ἐκτενής (LGr. also ἐκτενή, n.), prop. adj., extended, continued (sc. ἱερόσια, αἰτήσεις, εὐχή, or προσευχή, supplication, prayer), < ἐκτείνω, stretch out, prolong: see ectasis and extend.] In the Gr. Ch., one of the litanies recited by the deacon and choir. It follows the gospel, and is introduced by the words "Let us all say with our whole soul, and with our whole mind let us say." The choir responds with Kyrie Eleison, once after this invitation and the first petition, and thrice after the other petitions. See litany.

ectental (ek'ten'tal), a. [< Gr. ἐκτός, without, + ἐντός, within, + -al.] In embryol., of or pertaining to the outer and the inner layer of a gastrula: specifically said of the line of primitive juncture of the ectoderm and endoderm circumscribing the mouth of a gastrula. Also ecto-ental.

ecteron (ek'te-ron), n. An erroneous form of cederon. Mivart.

ecteronic (ek'te-ron'ik), a. An erroneous form of cederonic. Mivart.

ecthesis (ek'the-sis), n. [< Gr. ἐκθεσις, a setting forth, an exposition, < ἐκθετός, verbal adj., of ἐκτίθεσθαι, put out, set forth, < ἐκ, out, + τίθεσθαι, put, set.] An exposition, especially of faith.

In church history the Ecthesis is the decree of the emperor Heraclius, about A. D. 638, declaring that the controversy as to whether Christ has two wills or one will with a twofold or theandric operation (a view acceptable to the Monothelites) was to be left an open question.

The (first) Lateran synod, by which not only the Monothelite doctrine but also the moderating ecthesis of Heraclius and typos of Constant II. were anathematized.

Encyc. Brit., XV. 646.

ecthlypsis (ek-thlip'sis), n. [LL., < Gr. ἐκθλύψις, ecthlypsis, lit. a squeezing out, < ἐκθλύβειν, squeeze out, < ἐκ, out, + θλύβειν, squeeze. Cf. elision.] In Gr. and Lat. gram., omission or suppression of a letter; especially, in Lat. gram., elision or suppression in utterance of a final vowel and consonant in a syllable ending in m, as in the line ethoræa, n. Plural of ethoreum.

Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum. Virgil, Æneid, III. 658.

ethoræal, ethoræal (ek-thō-rē'al), a. [< ethoræum + -al.] Pertaining to an ethoræum: as, an ethoræal protrusion.

ethoræum (ek-thō-rē'um), n.; pl. ethoræa (-ä). [NL., < Gr. ἐκ, out, out of, + θοραξ, containing the seed, < θορός, seed, semen.] In zool., the thread of a thread-cell; the stinging-hair of a cnida; a cnidocil. Also ethoreum. See cut under cnida.

The inner wall of the sac [cnida] is produced into a sheath terminating in a long thread (ethoreum); this is usually twisted in many coils round its sheath, and fills up the open end of the sac. Pascoe, Zool. Class., p. 16.

ethyma (ek-thi'mä), n.; pl. ethymata (ek-thim'a-tä). [NL., < Gr. ἐθύμα, a pustule, papula, < ἐθύνω, break out, as heat or humors, < ἐκ, out, + θύω, rage, boil, rush.] In pathol., a large pustule intermediate in character between a furuncle or boil and an ordinary pustule.

ethymiform (ek-thi'mi-fōrm), a. [< Gr. ἐθύμα (ἐθύμα), a pustule, papula (see ethyma), + L. forma, form.] Having the form of or resembling an ethyma.

ecto-. [NL. ecto-, < Gr. ἐκτός, adv. and prep., without, outside (opposed to ἐντός, within: see ento-), < ἐκ, out, + quasi-superl. suffix -το-.] A prefix in words (chiefly biological) of Greek origin, signifying 'outside, without, outer, external, lying upon': as, ectoderm, the outer skin; Ectozoa, external parasites: opposed to endo-, ento-.

ectobasidium (ek'tō-bā-sid'i-um), n.; pl. ectobasidia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + NL. basidium, q. v.] In mycol., a basidium that is externally placed, as in Hymenomyces. Le Maout and Decaisne, Botany (trans.), p. 954.

Ectobia (ek-tō'bi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + βίος, life.] A genus of cursorial orthopterous insects, of the family Blattidae, or cockroaches, containing a number of small species, as E. germanica, the cockroach-bug (which see): sometimes synonymous with Blatta in a restricted sense. Westwood, 1839.

ectoblast (ek'tō-blast), n. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + βλαστός, a bud, germ.] 1. In biol., the outermost recognizable structure of a cell; a cell-wall, in any way distinguished from mesoblast or other more interior structures. The ectoblast is to a cell what the epiblast is to a more complex organism.—2. In embryol., the outer primary layer in the embryo of any metazoan animal; the epiblast; the ectoderm. See cut under blastocœle.

ectoblastic (ek'tō-blas'tik), a. [< ectoblast + -ic.] Pertaining to the ectoblast; consisting of ectoblast; ectodermal.

ectobliquus (ek-tōb-li'kwus), n.; pl. ectobliqui (-kwī). [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + L. obliquus, oblique.] In anat., the external oblique muscle of the abdomen, the obliquus abdominis externus. Also called extrobliquus. See cut under muscle.

ectocardia (ek'tō-kār'di-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + καρδιά, heart.] In teratol., a malformation in which the heart is out of its normal position.

ectocarotid (ek'tō-ka-rōt'id), n. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + E. carotid.] In anat., the external carotid artery; the outer branch of the common carotid.

Ectocarpaceæ (ek'tō-kār-pā-sē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Ectocarpus + -aceæ.] A family of phœoprocary marine algae having filamentous branching fronds, chiefly monosiphonous, with little or no cortex.

Ectocarpææ (ek-tō-kār-pē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Ectocarpus + -ææ.] 1. In bot., same as Ectocarpaceæ.—2. In zool., a division of nematophorous Coelenterata, containing those hydrozoans whose genitalia are developed from the ectoderm: opposed to Endocarpææ. The group is equivalent to the Hydromedusæ.

ectocarpous (ek-tō-kār'pus), a. [NL. ecto-, < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + καρπός, fruit.] Having external genitals, or developing sexual products from the ectoderm, as a hydromedusan; or of pertaining to the Ectocarpææ.

Ectocarpus (ek-tō-kār'pus), n. [NL.: see ectocarpous.] In bot., the principal genus of Ectocarpaceæ, including a large number of olive-brown filamentous species, many of which grow attached to larger algae.

ectochona (ek-tō-kō'nä), n.; pl. ectochonæ (-næ). [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + χώνη, a funnel: see chone.] An ectochone.

ectochone (ek'tō-kōn), n. [< NL. ectochona, q. v.] The outer division of a chone.

In many sponges (Geodia, Stelletta) the cortical domes are constricted near their communication with the subdermal cavity (subcortical crypt) by a transverse muscular sphincter, which defines an outer division or ectochone from an inner or endochone. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 415.

ectoclinal (ek-tō-klī'nal), a. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + κλίνας, lean: see clitic, clinode.] In bot., having the clinode (hymenium); and spores exposed upon the surface of the receptacle. Le Maout and Decaisne, Botany (trans.), p. 958.

ectocelian (ek-tō-sē'lī-an), a. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + κοίλιον, a hollow.] In anat., extraventricular; situated outside of the cavities of the brain: applied to that part of the corpus striatum (the nucleus lenticularis) which appears embedded in the wall of the hemisphere. Wilder.

ectocælic (ek-tō-sē'lik), a. [As ectocælian + -ic.] Situated on the outside of the common cavity of a coelenterate.

A misleading appearance of ectocælic septa is produced by the fact that some pairs of mesenteries die out after a very short course.

G. H. Fowler, Micros. Science, XXVIII. 5.

ectocondyle (ek-tō-kōn'dil), n. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + E. condyle.] The outer or external condyle of a bone, on the side away from the body: said especially of the condyles at the lower end of the humerus and of the femur respectively: opposed to entocondyle. See epicondyle.

ectocoracoid (ek-tō-kōr'a-koid), a. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + NL. coracoides, the coracoid.] In the dipnoan fishes, the element of the shoulder-girdle outside of that with which the pectoral limb articulates. Also called clavicle.

ectocranial (ek-tō-kra'i-ni-al), a. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + κρανίον, skull: see cranium.] Of or pertaining to the outer walls or surface of the skull; forming a part of the cranial parietes, as a bone.

There is a large bony tract . . . between the squamosal and the large interparietal, which is not one of the ordinary ectocranial bones.

W. K. Parker, Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXVIII. 135.

ectocuneiform (ek-tō-kū'nē-i-fōrm), a. and n. [< NL. ectocuneiforme, q. v.] I. a. In anat., pertaining to the outermost cuneiform bone; ectosphenoid.

Union of the navicular and cuboid, and sometimes the ectocuneiform bone, of the tarsus.

W. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV. 430.

II. n. The outermost one of the three cuneiform or wedge-shaped bones of the distal row of tarsal bones; the ectocuneiform or ectosphenoid bone of the foot. See cut under foot.

ectocuneiforme (ek-tō-kū'nē-i-fōr'mē), n.; pl. ectocuneiformia (-mi-ä). [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, without, + NL. cuneiforme, the cuneiform bone.] Same as ectocuneiform.

ectocyst (ek'tō-sist), n. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + κύστις, a bladder: see cyst.] In Polyzoa, the external tegumentary layer of the cœnœcium, forming the common cell or cyst in which each individual zooid is contained. See the extract, and cuts under Polyzoa and Plumatella.

As a rule the colonies [of polyzoans] possess a horny or parchment-like, frequently also calcareous, exoskeleton, which arises from the hardening of the cuticle around the individual zooids. Each zooid is accordingly surrounded by a very regular and symmetrical case—the ectocyst or cell; through the opening of which the anterior part of the soft body of the contained zooid with its tentacular crown can be protruded. Claus, Zoology (trans.), II. 71.

ectoderm (ek'tō-dērm), n. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + δέρμα, skin: see derm.] The completed outer layer of cells, or outer blastodermic membrane, in all metazoan animals, formed by the cells of the epiblast, and primitively constituting the outer wall of the whole body, as the endoderm does that of the body-cavity; an epiblast, ectoblast, or external blastoderm. The term is chiefly used in embryology, or of certain lower animals whose bodies consist essentially of an outer and an inner layer, and not as a synonym of the epidermis or cuticle of the higher animals. See cut under gastrula.

ectodermal (ek-tō-dēr'mal), a. [< ectoderm + -al.] Pertaining to the ectoderm; consisting of ectoderm: as, the ectodermal layer of a coelenterate.

The ovary bursts its ectodermal covering.

W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 515.

ectodermic (ek-tō-dēr'mik), a. [< ectoderm + -ic.] Same as ectodermal.

ecto-entad (ek'tō-en'tad), adv. [< Gr. ἐκτός, without, + ἐντός, within, + -ad. Cf. ectad, entad.] In anat., from without inward. [Rare.]

A part may be divided by cutting either ecto-entad, from without inward, or ento-entad, from within outward.

Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 27.

ecto-ental (ek'tō-en'tal), a. Same as ectental.

The mesoderm grows out from the ectental line.

C. S. Minot, Medical News, XLIX, 249.

ectogastrocnemius (ek-tō-gas-trok-nē'mi-us), n.; pl. ectogastrocnemii (-i). [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + γαστήρ, stomach, + κνήμη, the lower leg, tibia.] The outer gastrocnemial muscle, or outer head of the gastrocnemius; the gastrocnemius externus. See cut under muscle.

ectogenous (ek-toj'e-nus), a. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + -γενής, producing: see -genous.] Originating or developed outside of the host; externally parasitic: opposed to endogenous.

Some of the pathogenous bacteria are accustomed to develop and multiply without the body, while others only do so within it. The former kind we may describe as ectogenous, the latter as endogenous.

Ziegler, Pathol. Anat. (trans.), i, § 203.

ectogluteus (ek-tō-glō'tē-us), n.; pl. ectoglutei (-i). [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, without, + γλουτός, the rump, buttocks: see gluteus, gluteal.] In anat., the outer or great gluteal muscle; the gluteus maximus. Also ectogluteus. See cut under muscle.

ectogluteal (ek-tō-glō'tē-al), a. [< ectogluteus + -al.] Pertaining to the ectogluteus. Also ectogluteal.

ectolecithal (ek-tō-les'i-thal), a. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + λέκω, yolk, + -al.] In embryol., noting those ova which have the food-yolk peripheral in position, and thus exterior to the formative yolk. The cleavage or segmentation is consequently confined at first to the inner parts of the ovum, and it is only in later stages, when the food-yolk has shifted to the center, that the cleavage becomes peripheral. The egg of the spider is an example. See centrolecithal, telolecithal.

The first processes of segmentation in these at first ectolecithal ova are withdrawn from observation, since they take place in the center of an egg covered by a superficial layer of food-yolk.

Claus, Zoology (trans.), I, 112.

Ectolithia (ek-tō-lith'i-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + λίθος, stone.] Those radiolarians which have an external silicious skeleton or exoskeleton: distinguished from Endolithia.

Only a few [radiolarians] remain naked and without firm deposits: as a rule, the soft body possesses a silicious skeleton, which either lies entirely outside the central capsule (Ectolithia), or is partially within it (Endolithia).

Claus, Zoology (trans.), I, 189.

ectolithic (ek-tō-lith'ik), a. [As Ectolithia + -ic.] Extracapsular or exoskeletal, as the skeleton of a radiolarian; or of pertaining to the Ectolithia; not endolithic.

ectomere (ek'tō-mēr), n. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + μέρος, part.] In embryol., the less granular of the two blastomeres into which the mammalian ovum divides: also applied to a descendant of this blastomere in the first stages of development. See blastomere, entomere.

ectomeric (ek'tō-mēr'ik), a. [< ectomere + -ic.] Having the character of an ectomere.

ectoparasite (ek-tō-par-a-sit), n. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + παράσιτος, a parasite: see parasite.] An external parasite; a parasite living upon the exterior of the host, as distinguished from an endoparasite. Lice, fleas, ticks, etc., are ectoparasites. The term has no classificatory significance in zoology or botany.

ectoparasitic (ek-tō-par-a-sit'ik), a. [< ectoparasite + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of an ectoparasite or of ectoparasites; epizoic.

In the entoparasitic forms of this division the visual organs disappear, while they are persistent in many of the ectoparasitic forms.

Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 154.

ectopectoralis (ek-tō-pek-tō-rā'lis), n.; pl. ectopectorales (-lēs). [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + L. pectoralis, pectoral: see pectoral.] In anat., the outer or great pectoral muscle; the pectoralis major (which see, under pectoralis).

ectopia (ek-tō-pi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκτόπιος, away from a place, out of place, out of the way, < ἐκ, out, + τόπος, place: see topic.] In pathol., morbid displacement of parts, usually congenital: as, ectopia of the heart or of the bladder. Also ectopy.

ectopic (ek-top'ik), a. [< ectopia + -ic.] Characterized by ectopia.

The gestation is ectopic, that is, proceeding in an abnormal locality, which is unfit for the office imposed upon it.

R. Barnes, Dis. of Women, p. 370.

Ectopistes (ek-tō-pis'tēs), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκτοπίσσειν, wander, migrate, < ἐκτός, away from a place, < ἐκ + τόπος, place.] A genus of pigeons, of the family Columbidae. They have short tarsi feathered part way down in front, a short bill feathered far forward, the wings acutely pointed by the first three primaries, a long cuneate tail of 12 tapering acuminate feathers, wing-coverts with black spots, partly-colored tail-feathers, an iridescent neck, and the sexes distinguishable by color. E. migratoria is the common wild pigeon or passenger-pigeon of North America. See cut under passenger-pigeon.

ectoplasm (ek'tō-plazm), n. [< Gr. ἐκτός, without, + πλάσμα, a thing formed, < πλάσσειν, form.]

1. In zool., the exterior protoplasm or sarcode of a cell; the ectosarc: applied to the denser exterior substance of infusorians and other unicellular organisms, or of a free protoplasmic body, as a zoospore.

In the Infusoria, which are covered by a firm cuticle, there is a central semifluid mass of sarcode (endoplasm) which is distinct from the more compact peripheral layer of sarcode (ectoplasm).

Claus, Zoology (trans.), I, 54.

2. In bot., the outer hyaline layer or film of the protoplasmic mass within a cell.

ectoplasmic (ek-tō-plaz'mik), a. [< ectoplasm + -ic.] Pertaining to or consisting of ectoplasm.

ectoplastic (ek-tō-plas'tik), a. Same as ectoplasmic.

The differentiation of this cortical substance (which is not a frequent or striking phenomenon in tissue-cells) may be regarded as an ectoplastic (i. e., peripheral) modification of the protoplasm, comparable to the entoplastic (central) modification which produces a nucleus.

E. R. Lankester, Encyc. Brit., XIX, 833.

ectopopliteal (ek'tō-pop-lit'ē-al), a. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + L. poples (poplit-), hock, knee: see popliteal.] In anat., situated upon the outer side of the popliteal space or region: as, the ectopopliteal nerve.

Ectoprocta (ek-tō-prok'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of ectoproctus.] A division of the Polyzoa established by Nitsche, characterized by having the anus outside of the circle of tentacles: opposed to Endoprocta. See the extract.

In the Ectoprocta, . . . the endocyst consists of two layers, an outer and inner; of which the former is the representative of the ectoderm in other animals. The latter lines the walls of the pericentral cavity, and is reflected thence, like an peritoneal tunic, over the tentacular sheath and into the interior of the tentacula, whence it is continued on to the alimentary canal, of which it forms the external investment. The endoderm, which lines the alimentary canal, is of course continuous, through the oral opening, with the ectoderm.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 571.

ectoproctous (ek-tō-prok'tus), a. [< NL. ectoproctus, < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + πρόκτος, the anus, posterior.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Ectoprocta: specifically applied to those polyzoans, as the Gymnolamata, which have the anus situated outside the circle of tentacles: opposed to endoproctous.

It has been pointed out that the characteristic polypide of the ectoproctous Polyzoa is a structure developed from the cystid.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 396.

ectopterygoid (ek-top-ter'i-goid), a. and n. [< NL. ectopterygoideus, q. v.] I. a. Pertaining to the external pterygoid bone or muscle.

II. n. 1. An external pterygoid bone; one of the lateral bones of the palate of some animals, as reptiles. It is highly developed, for instance, in the crocodile. See Crocodylia.—2. In typical fishes, the external of two bones just behind the palatine, generally called pterygoid. See cut under palato-quadrate.—3. In anat., the ectopterygoid muscle.

ectopterygoideus (ek-top-ter-i-go'i-dē-us), n.; pl. ectopterygoidei (-i). [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + NL. pterygoideus: see pterygoid.] In anat., the external pterygoid muscle. See pterygoideus.

ectopy (ek'tō-pi), n. Same as ectopia.

ectosarc (ek'tō-sārk), n. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + σάρξ (sark-), flesh.] The ectoplasm of a protozoan; the exterior substance of the body of an animal of low organization, as an amoeba or other rhizopod or protozoan, in any way distinguished from an endosarc; the usually thicker, denser, tougher, or otherwise modified protoplasm which forms an envelop of the body, as differentiated from the interior substance or contents. The term is used chiefly in connection with amoebas or other rhizopods, in which, though there may be no definite cell-wall, the outer sarcode is differentiated in some way from the inner substance, or endosarc.

ectosarcode (ek-tō-sār'kōd), n. Same as ectosarc.

ectosarcodous (ek-tō-sār'kō-dus), a. [< ectosarcode + -ous.] Consisting of external sarcode; constituting an ectosarc; ectoplasmic.

ectosarcous (ek-tō-sār'kus), a. [< ectosarc + -ous.] Of or pertaining to the ectosarc.

ectosomal (ek'tō-sō-mal), a. [< ectosome + -al.] Of or pertaining to the ectosome; cortical, as the exterior region of a sponge.

ectosome (ek'tō-sōm), n. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + σῶμα, body.] In sponges, the outer region, forming the roof and walls of the subdermal chambers, composed of ectoderm and a superficial layer of endoderm; the cortex: distinguished from choanosome and endosome.

The choanosome forms a middle layer between a reticulation of ectosome on the one side and of endoderm and mesoderm, i. e., endosome, on the other.

Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII, 415.

ectosphenoid (ek-tō-sfē'noid), n. [< Gr. ἐκτός, without, + σφαινοειδής, wedge-shaped: see sphenoid.] Same as ectocuneiform. [Rare.]

ectosporous (ek-tō-spō'rus), a. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + σπόρος, seed: see spore.] Forming spores externally; exosporous.

ectosteal (ek-tōs'tē-al), a. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + ὀστέον, bone, + -al.] Relating to or situated on the outside of a bone; proceeding from without inward, as a growth of bone.

ectosteally (ek-tōs'tē-al-i), adv. In an ectosteal manner or position.

ectostosis (ek-tōs'tō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + ὀστέον, bone, + -osis.] That form of ossification of cartilage which begins in or immediately under the perichondrium; also, growth of bone from without inward; periosteal ossification.

ectothecal (ek-tō-thē'kal), a. [< Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + θήκη, case: see theca.] In bot., having thecae or asci exposed, as in discomycetous fungi and gymnocarpous lichens; discomycetous; gymnocarpous.

ectotriceps (ek-tō'tri-seps), n.; pl. ectotricepites (ek-tō'tri-sep'i-tēs). [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + NL. triceps.] In anat., the outer head or external division of the triceps muscle of the arm, considered as a distinct muscle. Also extratriceps.

Ectozoa (ek-tō-zō'ā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of ectozoön, q. v.] External parasites in general, as distinguished from Entozoa, or internal parasites. Thus, the fish-lice, or Epizoa, are Ectozoa, as are other lice, ticks, fleas, etc. The term is a vague one, having no classificatory significance, and implying no structural affinity among the creatures designated by it. Also called ectoparasites.

ectozoan (ek-tō-zō'an), n. [< Ectozoa + -an.] One of the Ectozoa; an epizoan; an ectoparasite.

ectozoic (ek-tō-zō'ik), a. [< Ectozoa + -ic.] Pertaining to the Ectozoa; epizoic; ectoparasitic.

ectozoön (ek-tō-zō'on), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐκτός, outside, + ζῷον, animal.] One of the Ectozoa; an ectozoan.

Ectrephes (ek'tre-fēs), n. [NL. (Pascos, 1866), < Gr. ἐκτρέφειν, bring up, breed, produce, < ἐκ, out, + τρέφειν, nourish.] A genus of beetles, of the family Ptiniidae, containing a few Australian species. Also Anapestus.

Ectrichodia (ek-tri-kō'di-ā), n. [NL. (Serville, 1825), < Gr. ἐκ, out, + τρίχης, like hair, hairy, < τριχ- (trich-), hair, + εἶδος, form.] A genus of bugs, of the family Reduviidae and subfamily Ectrichodinae. E. cruciata is a generally distributed species in the United States, about half an inch long, of a shining bright-red color, variegated with black, short, stout, hairy antennae of a dusky color, and thick, piceous rostrum.

Ectrichodides (ek-tri-kō'di-dēs), n. pl. [NL.] A group of hemipterous insects, represented by the genus Ectrichodia.

Same as Ectrichodinae.

Ectrichodinae (ek-tri-kō'di-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Ectrichodia + -inae.] A subfamily of bugs, of the family Reduviidae, typified by the genus Ectrichodia.

ectrodactylia (ek'trō-dak'til'i-ā), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. ἐκτροπίζειν, miscarriage, < δάκτυλος, finger.] In teratol., a malformation in which one or more fingers are wanting.

ectrodactylism (ek'trō-dak'ti-lizm), n. [As ectrodactylia + -ism.] Same as ectrodactylia.

ectropic (ek-trop'ik), a. [< Gr. ἐκτροπος, turning out of the way, < ἐκτρέπειν, turn out, < ἐκ, out, + τρέπειν, turn.] Turned outward or everted, as an eyelid, when the inner or conjunctival surface is exposed, as in ectropion.

Ectrichodia cruciata.

ectropical (ek-trop'i-kal), a. [< Gr. ἐκ, out, + τροπικός, tropic (see tropic), + -al.] Belonging to parts outside the tropics; extratropical. [Rare.]

ectropium (ek-trō'pi-on, -um), n. [< NL., < Gr. ἐκτρόπιον, everted eyelid, < ἐκτρέπω, turning out: see ectropic.] In pathol.: (a) An abnormal eversion or turning outward of the eyelids. (b) Eversion of the cervical endometrium of the womb.

ectropometer (ek-trō-pom'e-tēr), n. [< Gr. ἐκτροπή, a turning off, turning aside (< ἐκτρέπω, turn off: see ectropic), + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument used on shipboard for determining the bearing or compass-direction of objects. The ectropometer in use in the United States Navy consists of a vertical stanchion fitted in sockets on the deck or bridge and surmounted by a compass-card without a magnet. The card turns on a vertical axis and is fitted with an alidade. The magnetic heading of the ship being adjusted on this card to a line parallel with the keel, the alidade gives readily the bearing of land, lighthouses, etc. Also ectropometer.

ectrotic (ek-trot'ik), a. [*< Gr. ἐκτροτικός, of or for abortion, < ἐκτρέω, abortion, < ἐκτρέω, verbal adj. of ἐκτρέω, abort, < ἐκ, out, + τρέω, τρέω, wound, injure.] In med., preventing the development or causing the abortion of a disease.

ectypal (ek'ti-pal), a. [< ectype + -al.] Taken from the original; imitated. [Rare.]

Exemplars of all the ectypal copies.

Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 417.

Ectypal world, in Platonic philos., the phenomenal world, the world of sense, as distinguished from the archetypal or noumenal world.

ectype (ek'tip), n. [= F. ectype = Sp. ectipo = Pg. ectipo, < L. ectypus, engraved in relief, embossed, < Gr. ἐκτύπος, engraved in relief, formed in outline, < ἐκ, out, + τύπος, figure: see type.] 1. A reproduction or copy of an original; a copy: opposed to prototype.

The complex ideas of substances are ectypes or "copies." Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxi. 13.

Eng. Cyc.

Some regarded him (Klopstock) as an ectype of the ancient prophets.

Specifically—2. In arch., a copy in relief or embossed.

ectypography (ek-ti-pog'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. ἐκτύπος, engraved in relief (see ectype), + -γραφία, < γράφω, write, engrave.] A method of etching in which the lines are left in relief upon the plate instead of being sunk into it.

écu (ā-kū' or ā'kū), n. [F., a shield (applied also to a coin, etc.), < OF. escu, escut, < L. scutum, a shield: see escutcheon, scutum.] 1. The shield carried by a mounted man-at-arms in the middle ages; especially, the triangular shield of no great length carried during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and hung around the neck by the girth, so as to cover the left arm and left side.—2. The name of several gold and silver coins current in France from the fourteenth century onward, having a shield as part of their type: in English usually rendered crown. Among these coins were the écu d'or (golden crown), the écu à la couronne (écu with the crown), Ecuadoran (ek-wā-dō'ran), a. and n. [< Ecuador + -an.] Same as Écuadorian.

Écuadorian (ek-wā-dō'ri-an), a. and n. [< Ecuador (Sp. Ecuador, so called because crossed by the equator, < Sp. ecuador = E. equator) + -ian.] 1. A. Pertaining to Ecuador: as, the Ecuadorian fauna.

The Ecuadorian section [of the Andes].

Encyc. Brit., VII. 644.

II. n. A native of Ecuador, a republic of South America, on the Pacific, north of Peru. ecumenic, ecumenic (ek-ū-men'ik), a. [= F. ecumenique = Sp. ecuménico = Pg. It. ecumenico (cf. G. ökumenisch = Dan. Sw. ökumenisk), < LL. ecumenicus, < Gr. οἰκουμένης, general, universal, of or from the whole world, < οἰκονέμν, the inhabited world, the whole world, fem. (see γῆ, earth) of οἰκουμένης, ppr. pass. of οἰκείν, inhabit, < οἰκος, a house: see economy.] Same as ecumenical (which is the usual form).

ecumenical, ecumenical (ek-ū-men'ik-al), a. [< ecumenic, ecumenic, + -al.] General; universal; specifically, belonging to the entire Christian church.

No other literature [than the French] exhibits so expansive and ecumenical a genius, or expounds so skillfully or appreciates so generously foreign ideas.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 160.

The assumption of the title of Ecumenical Patriarch was another proof of the vast designs entertained by the Bishops of Constantinople.

J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I. 29.

Both kings bound themselves to maintain the Catholic worship inviolate, . . . and agreed that an ecumenical council should at once assemble, to compose the religious differences.

Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 202.

The ancient Greek Church is the mother of ecumenical orthodoxy; she elaborated the fundamental dogmas of the Trinity and the Person of Christ, as laid down in the Apostles' and the Nicene creeds.

Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 10.

Ecumenical bishop, a title first assumed by John the Faster, Patriarch of Constantinople, in the latter part of the sixth century. Gregory the Great, Bishop of Rome (590-604), strongly opposed the use of the title; but from the time of Boniface III. (607), on whom it was conferred by the emperor Phocas, it has been used by the popes as their right.—Ecumenical council. See council.—Ecumenical divines, in the Gr. Ch., a title given to St. Basil the Great, St. Gregory the Divine, and St. John Chrysostom.

ecumenically, ecumenically (ek-ū-men'ik-al-i), adv. In a general or ecumenical manner. ecumenicity, ecumenicity (ek-ū-me-nis'it-i), n. [= F. ecumenicité = Pg. ecumenicidade; as ecumenic, ecumenic, + -ity.] The character of being ecumenical.

Some Catholics have protested against the ecumenicity of the synod in 1311 at Vienna, generally reckoned the 15th ecumenical [council].

Encyc. Brit., VI. 511.

écusson (ā-kū-sōn'), n. [F.: see escutcheon.] In her., an escutcheon, especially an escutcheon of pretense, or inescutcheon.

ecyphellate (ē-si-fel'āt), a. [*< NL. ecyphellatus, < L. e-priv. + NL. cyphella, q. v.] In bot., without ecyphella: applied to lichens, etc.

eczema (ek'ze-mā), n. [< NL. < Gr. ἐκζεμα, a cutaneous eruption, < ἐκείν, boil up or out, < ἐκ, out, + ζείν, boil.] An inflammation of the skin attended with considerable exudation of lymph. Ordinarily the eczematous patch is red, slightly swollen, more or less incrustated, and moist on the removal of the crust, and causes considerable itching and smarting.—Eczema papulosum, the form of eczema characterized by papules, the swollen papillae of the skin.—Eczema rubrum. (a) Pityriasis rubra. (b) Acute eczema when the color of the skin is very red.—Eczema squamosum. (a) Chronic eczema marked by the exfoliation of large quantities of epithelial scales. (b) Pityriasis rubra.—Erythematous eczema, a mild form of eczema, marked by little more than redness of the skin (erythema).—Vesicular eczema, the form or stage of eczema in which the eruption consists of vesicles containing serum.

eczematous (ek-zem'ā-tus), a. [= F. eczémateux; < eczema (t-) + -ous.] 1. Pertaining to or produced by eczema: as, eczematous eruptions.—2. Afflicted with eczema.

ed. An abbreviation (a) of editor; (b) of edition.

ed-1. [ME. ed-, < AS. ed- = OS. idug = OFries. et- = OHG. it-, ita-, MHG. ite- = Icel. idh- = Goth. id-, a prefix equiv. to L. re-, again, back: see re-.] A prefix now obsolete or occurring unfrequently in a few words, meaning 'again, back, re-' as in edgrow, edgrowth, ednew. See eddish, eddy.

Ed-2. [ME. Ed-, < AS. Edd-, a common element in proper names, being ead, happiness, prosperity, = OS. öd, estate, property, wealth, prosperity, = OHG. ôt, estate, = Icel. audhr, riches, wealth: see allodium.] An element in proper names of Anglo-Saxon origin, meaning originally 'property' (in Anglo-Saxon, 'prosperity' or 'happiness'), as Edward, Anglo-Saxon Eddward, protector of property; Edwin, Anglo-Saxon Eddwine, gainer or friend of property.

The suffix appears in L. -a-tu-s (E. -ate! -ade!, -ada, -ado, -eel, etc.; disguised in various forms, as in arm-y), -i-tus, -itus (E. -itel, -itl), -i-tus, -u-tus (E. -uite), and without a preceding vowel as -tus (E. -t, as in fact, facit, etc.).] The regular formative of the preterit or past tense, and the perfect participle, respectively, of English "weak" verbs: suffixes of different origin (see etymology), but now identical in form and phonetic relations, and so conveniently treated together. Either suffix is attached (with suppression of final silent -e, if any) to the infinitive or first person indicative, and varies in pronunciation and spelling according to the preceding consonant (the final consonant of the infinitive): (1) -ed, pronounced -ed after t, d, as in heated, loaded, etc., and archaically in other positions, as in hallowed, raised, etc., and usually in some perfect participles used adjectively, as in blessed, crooked, winged, etc., parallel to blest, crooked (pronounced krükt), winged (pronounced wingd), etc. (2) -ed, pronounced (with suppression of the vowel) d, after a sonant, namely, b, g "hard," g "soft" (-ge = dzh or zh), j (written -ge, as preceding), s (-se = z), th (-th = dh), v, z, l, m, n, ng, r, as in robbed, lagged, raged, engaged, rouged, hedged, raised, posed, smoothed, breathed, lived, buzzed, boiled, felled, beamed, dreamed, stoned, leamed, hanged, barred, abhorred, etc. (but after the liquids l, m, n, r, in some words also or only -t: see below), or after a vowel, or a vowel before h or w, as in hosed, ruled, brayed, towed, awed, hurrahed, etc.—most words of this class being formerly written without the vowel, which subsequently came to be indicated, pedantically, by an apostrophe, as in rais'd, breath'd, liv'd, etc. (this device being still retained by some, for its apparent metrical value, in verse, but otherwise little used in verse, though it is the rule in the analogous instance of the possessive case of nouns, as in man's, boy's, etc.), except in a few words which have preserved the simple form, namely, (3) -d, pronounced d (the vowel being suppressed in both pronunciation and spelling), as in paid, staid, shod, heard, sold, told, and (with loss of the final consonant of the infinitive) clad, had, and made (so spelled to preserve the "long" vowel), and, in preterit only, could, should, would—these forms being "irregular" in spelling only (laid, paid, staid), or in spelling and pronunciation, as compared with the forms having the usual

-ed. (4) -ed, pronounced t (the vowel being suppressed and the d assimilated to the preceding consonant) after a root, namely, c "soft" (= s), ch (= ts), f, k, p, q, qu (= k), s sord, sh, th sord, z (= z), as in faced, enticed, matched, cufted, coughed (pronounced kóft), looked, lacked, tipped, piqued, pressed, clashed, clashed, toothed, earthed, mixed, etc., such words being formerly as a rule, and still optionally (in verse, as preferred by Tennyson and other modern poets, or in restored or reformed spelling), spelled as pronounced, with t, as lookt, lackt, tipst, piest, mixt, fact, etc.; in some words, where -ed after a liquid, l, m, n, r, or a vowel, is pronounced t instead of, as regularly, d, and in some words after p, the spelling -t prevails, either exclusively (and then accompanied by a change of the radical vowel), as in dealt, felt, bought, caught, thought, wrought, brought, sought, taught, slept, sought, wept, etc., or with a parallel form in -ed pronounced d, as in spelt, spit, spelt, spelt, spelt, pent, burnt, etc. (the t in some cases absorbing the final -d of the infinitive, as in bent, blent, bullt, girt, etc.), with parallel forms spelled, spilted, etc. (bended, girded, etc.). (5) In some monosyllables the suffix -ed, reduced to -d or -t, as above, has blended with the final -d or -t of the infinitive, forming, in earlier spelling, a double consonant, dd or tt, which has since been simplified, as in shed, shred, hit, split, etc., all trace of the suffix being thus effaced, and such preterits and past participles being assimilated to the infinitive: an original long vowel in the infinitive becoming short in the preterit and past participle, as in read, preterit and past participle read (red, preterit and past participle red (where the change is recognized in the spelling), and hence, rarely, in the infinitive, as in spread, preterit and past participle spread. Some words ending in -ed (participles used as adjectives) may, with the definite article, or other definitive word, preceding, come to be used as nouns, having as such a possessive case (in s) and a plural (in -s): as, the police took charge of the deceased's effects; at the accused's countenance changed. This is found chiefly in newspaper language; but the plural, as "their beloveds," is not uncommon in recent poetry. See ad, ad, ad, ad, ad.

edacious (ē-dā'shu-s), a. [= It. edace, < L. edax (edac-), given to eating, < edere = E. eat: see eat.] Eating; given to eating; greedy; voracious.

Edaphodon (ē-daf'ō-don), n. [NL.: see edaphodont.] A fossil genus of chimaeroid fishes, of the order Holocephali, found in the Greensand, Chalk, and Tertiary strata. Buckland.

edaphodont (ē-daf'ō-don), n. [< NL. edaphodont (-s), < Gr. ēdāpos, bottom, foundation, + ōdōn (ōdōr-) = E. tooth.] A fossil chimaeroid fish of the genus Edaphodon.

Edda (ed'ā), n. [Icel., lit. great-grandmother.] A book written (in prose) by Snorri Sturluson (born about 1178, died by assassination 1241), containing the old mythological lore of Scandinavia and the old artificial rules for verse-making; also, a collection of ancient Icelandic poems. The name Edda, by whom given is not known, occurs for the first time in the inscription to one of the manuscripts of the work, written fifty or sixty years after Snorri's death. Snorri's Edda (Edda Snorra Sturlusonar) consists of five parts: Formáli (Preface), the Gylfaginning (Delusion of Gylfi), Bragar-ráður (Sayings of Bragi), Skáldskapar-mál (Art of Poetry), and Hattatal (Number of Meters), to which are added in some manuscripts Thurur, or a rhymed glossary of synonyms, lists of poets, etc. As the Skáldskapar-mál, or Art of Poetry, forms the chief part of the Edda (including several long poems), the work became a sort of handbook of poets, and so Edda came gradually to mean the old artificial poetry as opposed to the modern plain poetry contained in hymns and sacred poems. About the year 1643 the Icelandic bishop Brynjulf Sveinsson discovered a collection of the old mythological poems, which is erroneously ascribed to Sæmund Sigfússon (born about 1055, died 1138), and hence called after him Sæmundar Edda hins Fróðna, the Edda of Sæmund the Learned. The poems that compose this Edda are supposed to have been collected about the middle of the thirteenth century, but were composed probably in the eighth and ninth centuries. Hence the name now given to the collection, the Elder or Poetic Edda, in distinction from the Younger or Prose Edda of Snorri, to which alone the name Edda previously belonged. The most ancient of the poems in the Elder Edda is the Völuspá, the Prophecy of the Völva or sibyl.

Eddaic (ē-dā'ik), a. [< Eddā + -ic.] Same as Eddic.

The Eddaic version, however, of the history of the gods is not so circumstantial as that in the Ynglinga-saga.

Thai asked, and come the edisse-henne.

Ps. civ. [cv.], 40 (ME. version).

eddoes, edders (ed'ōz, ed'ēr), n. A name given by the negroes of the Gold Coast, as well as in the West Indies, to the roots of the taro-plant, Colocasia antiquorum. Also eddas.

eddy (ed'i), n.; pl. eddies (-iz). [The ME. form (and the AS., if any) not recorded; the word is either cognate with or derived from Icel. idha, an eddy, whirlpool, = Norw. ida, also ide (and in various other forms, ida, te, ea, eda, udu, uddu, vudu, odo, erju, inju, the last forms prob. of other origin; often with prefix bak, back, upp, up, kring, circle), = Sw. dial. idha, idd = Dan. dial. ide, an eddy, whirlpool; cf. Icel. idha = Norw. ida, whirl about; Icel. idh, f, a doing, idh, n, a restless motion, = Sw. id, industry, = Dan. id, pursuit, intention; Icel. idhim = Sw. idog, assiduous, diligent; prob. connected with AS. ed, etc., back (equiv. to L. re): see ed. Cf. eddish.] A part of a fluid, as a stream of water, which has a rotatory motion; any small whirl or vortex in a fluid. Eddies are due to the viscosity of fluids, and to the very small degree to which they slip over the surfaces of solids. A portion of fluid to which a rotatory motion has once been communicated loses this motion only by the gradual effect of viscosity, so that eddies subsist for some time. They are always found between counter-currents.

Avoid the violence of the current, by angling in the returns of a stream, or the eddies betwixt two streams, which also are the most likely places wherein to kill a fish in a stream, either at the top or bottom.

Cotton, in Walton's Angler, ii. 260.

And smiling eddies dimpled on the main.

Dryden.

The charmed eddies of autumnal winds

Built o'er his mouldering bones a pyramid.

Shelley, Alastor.

Alas! we are but eddies of dust,

Uplifted by the blast, and whirled

Along the highway of the world.

Longfellow, Golden Legend, ii.

Common observation seems to show that, when a solid moves rapidly through a liquid at some distance below the surface, it leaves behind it a succession of eddies in the fluid.

Stokes, On some Cases of Fluid Motion.

= syn. See stream.

eddy (ed'i), v.; pret. and pp. eddyed, ppr. eddy-ing. [< eddy, n.] I. intrans. To move circularly or in a winding manner, as the water of an eddy, or so as to resemble the movement of an eddy.

Time must be given for the intellect to eddy about a truth, and to appropriate its bearings.

De Quincey, Style, i.

As they looked down upon the tumult of the people, deepening and *eddy*ing in the wide square, . . . they uttered above them the sentence of warning—"Christ shall come."

Ruskin.

With *eddy*ing whirl the waters lock

Yon treeless mound forlorn,

The sharp-winged sea-fowl's breeding rock,

That floats the Spouting Horn.

O. W. Holmes, Agnes.

II. trans. To cause to move in an eddy; collect as into an eddy; cause to whirl. [Rare.]

edentulous (ē-den'tū-lus), a. [Appar. < edental + -ous; but prob. intended for edentulous, q. v.] Same as edentate. [Rare.]

Edentata (ē-den-tā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. edentatus, toothless: see edentate.] 1. In mammal., a Cuvierian order of mammals; the edentates. The term is literally incorrect, and in so far objectionable, few of these animals being edentulous or toothless; and the Linnean equivalent term, Bruta, is often employed instead. But the name is firmly established, and the members of the order do agree in certain dental characters, which are these: that incisors are never present, and that the teeth, when there are any, are homodont and (excepting in Tatusina) monophodont, growing from persistent pulps, and being devoid of enamel.

Edentate Skull of Great Ant-eater (Myrmecophaga jubata).

The Edentata are ineducubilian placental mammals, with a relatively small cerebrum of one lobe, but otherwise very diversified in structure, appearance, and mode of life; the old-world forms are likewise widely different from those of the new world; most edentates are of the latter. The armadillos, sloths, and ant-eaters of America, and the fœdient ant-eaters and scaly ant-eaters of Africa and Asia, represent respectively five leading types of Edentata, affording a division of the order into the five suborders Loricata (armadillos), Tardigrada (sloths), Vermilinguina (American ant-eaters), Squamata (scaly ant-eaters or pangolins), and Fœdientia (digging ant-eaters or aardvarks). The Tardigrada, including a number of gigantic fossil forms, as the mylodons and megatheriums, formerly called Gravigrada, are herbivorous, and the living forms are all arboreal. The others are carnivorous and chiefly insectivorous, and it is among these that the entirely toothless forms occur, as in the ant-eaters. The Cuvierian Edentata included the Monotremata, now long since eliminated.

2. A group of crustaceans. Latreille, 1826.

edentate (ē-den'tāt), a. and n. [= F. édenté = Sp. edentado, < L. edentatus, toothless, pp. of edentare, render toothless, < e, out, + den(t)-s = E. tooth; cf. dentate: see Edentata.] 1. a. Edentulous; toothless.—2. Of or pertaining to the Edentata, and thus having at least no front teeth.

II. n. 1. One of the Edentata; an ineducubilian placental mammal without incisors.—2. A toothless creature.

I tried to call to him to move, but how could a poor edentate like myself articulate a word?

Kingsley, Alton Locke, xxxvi.

edentated (ē-den'tā-ted), a. [< edentate + -ed.] Deprived of teeth; edentate. [Rare.]

Edentati (ē-den-tā'ti), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. edentatus, toothless: see Edentata.] A group of edentate mammals. Vicq-d'Azyr, 1792.

edentation (ē-den-tā'shən), n. [*< L. as if edentatio(n)-, < edentare, pp. edentatus, render toothless: see edentate.] The state or quality of being edentate; toothlessness.

edentulate (ē-den'tū-lāt), a. [*< NL. edentulatus, < L. edentulus, toothless: see edentulous.] In entom., without teeth; edentate: said of the mandibles when they have no tooth-like processes on the inner side. Kirby.

edentulous (ē-den'tū-lus), a. [< L. edentulus, toothless, < e-priv. + den(t)-s = E. tooth: see dent. Cf. edentate.] Without teeth; toothless.

The jaws of birds are always edentulous and sheathed with horn, of diverse configurations, adapted to their different modes of life and kinds of food. Owen, Anat., Int.

edert, n. See edder.²

Edessa (ē-des'ā), n. [NL., < L. Edessa, Gr. Ἔδεσσα, a city of Macedonia.] A genus of pentatomid bugs, typical of a subfamily Edessinae.

Over 100 species are known, of which more than 40 inhabit North America; only one is found in the United States. The genus was founded by Fabricius in 1803.

Edessan (ē-des'an), a. [< L. Edessa, Gr. Ἔδεσσα, a city of Mesopotamia; + -an.] Of or pertaining to Edessa, a city in northwestern Mesopotamia, noted as the seat of an important theological school, and as the chief center from which Nestorianism spread over a great part of Asia.—Edessan family or branch of liturgies, that class of liturgies which is commonly called Nestorian, because used by Nestorians. Its oldest representative is the Liturgy of the Apostles (Adeus and Maris). See liturgy.

Cowper, Task, v. 216.

2. The extreme border or margin of anything; the verge; the brink; as, the edge of a table; the edge of a precipice.

Than draw straight thy cloth, & lay the bougt [fold] on the vtur edge of the table.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 129.

You knew he walk'd o'er perils, on an edge, More likely to fall in than to get o'er.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. 1.

Specifically—(a) In math., a line, straight or curved, along which a surface is broken, so that every section of the surface through that line has a cusp or an abrupt change of direction at the point of intersection with it. (b) In zool., the extreme boundary of a surface, part, or mark, generally distinguished as posterior, anterior, lateral, superior, etc. In entomology it is often distinguished from the margin, which is properly an imaginary space surrounding the disk of any surface, and limited by the edge. The outer edge of the elytron of a beetle may be either the extreme boundary of the elytron, or the lateral boundary of the upper surface, separated from the true boundary by a deflexed margin called the epipleura.

3. The border or part adjacent to a line of division; the part nearest some limit; an initial or terminal limit; rim; skirt: as, the edge of the evening; the outer and inner edges of a field; the horizon's edge.

For the sayde temple stondeth vpon the est egge of Mounte Morrea, and the Mounte Olyete is right est from it.

Sir R. Guyford, Pylgrimage, p. 43.

The new general, unacquainted with his army, and on the edge of winter, would not hastily oppose them.

Milton.

It [Watling Street] ran closely along the edge of this great forest, by the bounds of our Leicestershire.

J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 190.

4. The side of a hill; a ridge. Halliwel.

[North. Eng.]

Educate and inform the whole mass of the people. Enable them to see that it is their interest to preserve peace and order, and they will preserve them. Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 276.

There is now no class, as a class, more highly educated, broadly educated, and deeply educated, than those who were, in old times, best described as partridge-popping squirrels. De Morgan, Budget of Paradoxes, p. 381.

= Syn. To teach, rear, discipline, develop, nurture, breed, indoctrinate, school, drill.

education (ed'ū-kā'shon), n. [= F. éducation = Sp. educación = Pg. educação = It. educazione, < L. educatio(-n-), a breeding, bringing up, rearing, < educare, educate: see educate.]

1. The imparting or acquisition of knowledge; mental and moral training; cultivation of the mind, feelings, and manners. Education in a broad sense, with reference to man, comprehends all the disciplines and enlightens the understanding, corrects the temper, cultivates the taste, and forms the manners and habits; in a narrower sense, it is the special course of training pursued, as by parents or teachers, to secure any one or all of these ends. Under physical education is included all that relates to the development and care of the organs of sensation and of the muscular and nervous systems. Intellectual education comprehends the means by which the powers of the understanding are developed and improved, and knowledge is imparted. Ethetic education is the development of the sense of the beautiful, and of technical skill in the arts. Moral education is the cultivation of the moral nature. Technical education is intended to train persons in the arts and sciences that underlie the practice of the trades or professions. Education is further divided into primary education, or instruction in the first elements of knowledge, received by children in common or elementary schools or at home; secondary, that received in grammar and high schools or in academies; higher, that received in colleges, universities, and postgraduate study; and special or professional, that which aims to fit one for the particular vocation or profession in which he is to engage. With reference to animals, the word is used in the narrowest sense of training in useful or amusing acts or habits.

By wardship the moste parte of noble men and gentlemen within this Realme have bene brought vp ignorantly and voide of good educations.

Quoted in Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), [Forewords, p. ix.]

To love her was a liberal education. Steele, Tatler, No. 49.

Is there no danger of their neglecting or rejecting altogether those opinions of which they have heard so little during the whole course of their education? Hume, Dial. concerning Natural Religion, I.

But education, in the true sense, is not mere instruction in Latin, English, French, or history. It is the unfolding of the whole human nature. It is growing up in all things to our highest possibility. J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 36.

2. The rearing of animals, especially bees, silkworms, or the like; culture, as of bacteria in experimenting; a brood or collection of cultivated creatures. [Recent, from French use.]

If they [silkworm-moths] were free from disease, then a crop was sure; if they were infected, the education would surely fail. . . . Small educations, reared apart from the ordinary magnanerie, . . . were recommended. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 69.

Bureau of Education, an office of the United States government, forming a part of the Department of the Interior, and charged with the promotion of the cause of education through the collection and diffusion of statistical and other information. It originated in 1867. Its head is called the Commissioner of Education. = Syn. Training, Discipline, etc. (see instruction); breeding; schooling.

education-pipe (ē-duk'shon-pip), n. In steam-engines, the pipe by which the exhaust-steam from the cylinder is led into the condenser or allowed to escape into the atmosphere.

education-port (ē-duk'shon-pōrt), n. An opening for the passage of steam in a steam-engine from the valves to the condenser; the exhaust-port.

education-valve (ē-duk'shon-valv), n. A valve through which a fluid is discharged or exhausted: as, the exhaust- or education-valve of the steam-engine.

eductive (ē-duk'tiv), a. [< L. eductus, pp. of educere, draw out (see educē), + -ive.] Tending to educē or draw out. Boyle.

educt (ē-duk'tor), n. [< LL. eductor (only as equiv. to L. educator), < L. educare, draw out.] That which brings forth, elicits, or extracts. [Rare.]

Stimulus must be called an educt of vital ether. Dr. E. Darwin.

edulcorant (ē-dul'kō-rant), a. and n. [< L. as if edulcorant*(-t)-s, ppr. of edulcorare*, sweeten: see edulcorate.] 1. a. In med., sweetening, or rendering less acid.

II. n. A drug intended to render the fluids of the body less acid.

edulcorate (ē-dul'kō-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. edulcorated, ppr. edulcorating. [< L. as if edulcoratus*, pp. of edulcorare* (> F. edulcorer = Pg. edulcorar, sweeten), < e, out, + LL. dulcorare, sweeten: see dulcorate.] 1. To remove acidity from; sweeten.

Succory, a little edulcorated with sugar and vinegar, is by some eaten in the summer, and more grateful to the stomach than the palate. Evelyn, Acetaria.

2. In chem., to free from acids, salts, or impurities by washing.

The copious powder that results from their union is, by that union of volatile parts, so far fixed that, after they have edulcorated it with water, they prescribe the calcining of it in a crucible for five or six hours.

Boyle, Works, IV, 311.

edulcoration (ē-dul-kō-rā'shon), n. [= F. édulcoration = Pg. edulcoração; as edulcorate + -ion.] 1. The act of sweetening by admixture of some saccharine substance.—2. In chem., the act of sweetening or rendering more mild or pure by freeing from acid or saline substances, or from any soluble impurities, by repeated affusions of water.

edulcorative (ē-dul-kō-rā-tiv), a. [edulcorate + -ive.] Having the quality of sweetening or purifying; edulcorant.

edulcorator (ē-dul-kō-rā-tor), n. One who or that which edulcorates; specifically, in chem., a contrivance formerly used for supplying small quantities of water to test-tubes, watch-glasses, etc.

edulous (ē-dū'li-us), a. [L. edulūa, eatables, food (rare sing. edulūm, > It. edulio), prop. pl. of edule (> Pg. edulo), neut. of adj. edulis, eatable, < edere = E. eat.] Edible; eatable.

The husks of peas, beans, or such edulous pulses.

Sir T. Browne, Misc., p. 13.

Edwardsia (ed-wārd'zī-ā), n. [NL. (Quatrefages, 1842), named after Henri Milne-Edwards, a French naturalist.] A genus of sea-anemones, made type of the family Edwardsiidae. They are not fixed or attached, but live free in the sand, or, when young, are even free-swimming organisms. In the latter state they have been described as a different genus, Arenolucania. E. beaumonti is an example.

Edwardsiidae (ed-wārd'zī-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Edwardsia + -idae.] A group of Actiniaria with eight septa. There are two pairs of directive septa, the remaining four septa being impaired. All the septa are furnished with reproductive organs. The tentacles are simple, and usually more numerous than the septa. The body-wall is soft, and the column longitudinally sulcate, with eight invaginations.

edwite, v. t. [ME. edwiten, edwiten, < AS. edwitan (= OHG. itawizan, itawizon, MHG. itewizen = Goth. id-wēitan), reproach, < ed-, back, + witan, blame: see wite, and cf. twit, < AS. etwitan.] To reproach; rebuke.

The fyrste worde that he warpe was, "where is the bolle?" His wif gan edwite hym tho how wikkedlich he lyued.

Piers Plowman (B), v. 370.

edwite, n. [ME. edwite, edwyte, edwit, edwyt, < AS. edwit (= OHG. itawiz, itawiz, MHG. itewize, itewiz = Goth. id-wēit), reproach, < edwitan, reproach: see edwite, v.] Reproach; blame.

Man, hytt was full gret dyspyte
So offte to make me edwite.

Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 124.

Most doughty of dedis, dreght in armys,
And the strongest in stoure, that euer on stede rode,
Ercules, that honerable, edist of my knyghts.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 5324.

ee (ē), n. [A dial. form of eye: see eye.] An eye. [Now chiefly Scotch.]

Fears for my Willie brought tears in my ee.

Burns, Wandering Willie.

ee. A common English digraph, of Middle English origin, having now the sound of "long" e, namely, ē. In Middle English it was actually "double" e—that is, the long sound ā corresponding to the short sound e, representing an Anglo-Saxon long e (ē), as in beet, greet, meet, breed, feed, etc., or an Anglo-Saxon æ, as in seed, eel, sleep, weed, etc., or ed, as in cheek, steep, leek, etc., or eo, as in beo, dear, deep, creep, weed, etc., such vowels or diphthongs becoming in later Middle English long e, written either e or ee, and in early modern English spelled ee or ea, with some differentiation (see ea). In words of other than Anglo-Saxon origin ee has the same sound, except in a few words not completely Anglicized, as in matinée. Words of Oriental or other remote origin having the vowel i (pronounced ē) are often spelled with ee when turned into English form, as elches, suites, etc.

E. E. An abbreviation of errors excepted, a saving clause frequently placed at the foot of an account rendered. Also, in a fuller form, E. and O. E. (which see).

-ee¹. [Late ME. -e or -ee, < OF. -e, fem. -ee, mod. F. (with a diacritical accent) -é, fem. -ée (pron. alike), < L. -atus, fem. -ata, pp. of verbs in -are, F. -er. Early ME. -e, -ee, from the same source, has usually become thoroughly Englished as -y, or -ey; cf. arm-y, jur-y, jell-y, chim-ney, jour-ney, etc. See -ale¹, -ade¹, -y¹.] A suffix of French, or more remotely of Latin origin, ultimately the same as -ate¹ and -ed², forming the termination of the perfect passive participle, and indicating the object of an action. It occurs chiefly in words derived from old Law French or formed according to the analogy of such words, as in pay-ee, draw-ee, assign-ee, employ-ee, etc., denoting the person who is paid, drawn on, assigned to, employed, etc., as opposed to the agent in -or¹ or -er¹ (in legal use generally -or¹), as pay-er or pay-or, draw-er, assign-or, employ-er, etc.

-ee². [Cf. dim. -ie, -y, and see -ee¹.] A diminutive termination, occurring in bootee, goatee, etc. The diminutive force is less obvious in settee, which may be regarded as a diminutive of sett-le.

eeef, a. A dialectal form of eath.

Howbeit to this daie, the dregs of the old ancient Chaucer English are kept as well there [in Ireland] as in Fingall, as they terme . . . easie, eeef, or eele.

Stanhurst, Descrip. of Ireland, p. 11, in Holinshed.

eegrass (ē'grās), n. Same as eddish, 1.

eeek¹, v., adv., and conj. An obsolete form of eke.

eeek² (ēk), v. i. [A dial. var. of itch or yuck: see itch, yuck.] To itch. [Prov. Eng.]

eekeet, v., adv., and conj. An obsolete form of eke.

eel (ēl), n. [Early mod. E. also eale; < ME. el, ele, < AS. æl = MD. ael, D. aal = Fries. tel = MLG. āl, el, LG. al = OHG. MHG. āl, G. aal = Icel. áll = Sw. äl = Norw. Dan. aal, an eel; perhaps orig. Teut. agla* (cf. L. anguilla = Gr. ἐχέλις, an eel), dim. of a supposed agi* = L. anguis = Gr. ἐχis = Skt. ahi, a snake, < √ agh, angh*, choke, strangle: see anguish, anger¹, etc., < Echis, Echidna.] 1. An elongated apodal fish of the family Anguillidae and genus Anguilla, of which there are several species. The body is very long and subcylindrical, covered with discrete minute elliptical scales, chiefly arranged diagonally to the axis and at right angles with one another, but immersed in the skin, and partly concealed by a slippery mucous coat. The head is somewhat depressed, and the lower jaw protuberant. The teeth are slender, conic, and crowded in small bands in both jaws and in a longitudinal band on the vomer. The dorsal, anal, and caudal fins are nearly uniform, and completely united into one, the dorsal beginning near the second third of the entire length of the body. The color is generally brownish or blackish, except on the belly, which is whitish or silvery. The females attain a considerably larger size than the males. The sexual organs are minute except in the breeding season, and sexual intercourse takes place in the sea. Young females ascend into fresh water, but the males remain in salt water, and have rarely been seen; and when full-grown the females return to the sea for sexual intercourse and spawning. Eels are of much economic importance, and objects of special fisheries. The common European species is Anguilla anguilla or A. vulgaris; the American is A. rostrata. See Anguilla, Anguillidae.

In that Flome men fynden Eles of 30 Fote long and more.
Is the adder better than the eel,
Because his painted skin contents the eye?
Shak., T. of the S., iv. 3.
It is agreed by most men that the eel is the most dainty fish.
I. Walton, Complete Angler, I. 23.
2. Any fish of the order Apodes or Symbranchii, of which there are many families and several hundred species.—3. Some fish resembling or likened to an eel; an anguilliform fish.—4. Some small nematoid or threadworm, as of the family Anguillulidae, found in vinegar, sour paste, etc. See vinegar-eel, and cut under Nematodea.—Blind eel, a bunch of eel-grass or marsh-grass. (Colloq., Chesapeake Bay, U. S.)—Electric eel, a remarkable fish, Electrophorus or Gymnotus electricus, of the family Electrophoridae, of a thick, eel-like form with a rounded, finless back, the vent at the throat, and the anal fin commencing behind it, of a brownish color above and whitish below. It has the power of giving strong electric discharges at will. The shocks produced are often violent, and serve as a means both of offense and of defense. They are weakened by frequent repetitions. Its electrical apparatus consists of two pairs of longitudinal bodies between the skin and the muscles of the caudal region, one pair next to the back and one along the anal fin. This apparatus is divided into about 240 cells, and is supplied by over 200 nerves. The electric eel is the most powerful of electric fishes. It sometimes attains a length of over 6 feet. It inhabits the fresh waters of Brazil and Guiana.—Pug-nosed eel, an eel of the genus Simenichelys (which see); so called by fishermen. It is a deep-sea species, found off the Newfoundland banks, often burrowing in the halibut, whence the specific name S. parasiticus.—Salt eel. (a) An eel or an eel's skin prepared for use as a whip.

Up betimes, and with my salt eele went down in the parlor, and there got my boy and did beat him til I was faine to take breath two or three times.

Peypis, Diary, April 24, 1663.

Hence—(b) A rope's end; a flogging. [Nautical slang.]

Trembling for fear,

Lest from Bridport they get yet such another salt eel

As brave Duncan prepared for Mylneher.

eel-gig (ēl'gig), n. Same as eel-spear.

eel-grass (ēl'grās), n. 1. A grass-like naiadaceous marine plant, Zostera marina. [U. S.]

The dull weed upholstered the decaying wharves, and the only light that heaped them was the kelp and eel-grass left by higher floods. Lovell, Fireside Travels, p. 45.

2. The wild celery, Vallisneria spiralis.

eel-mother (ēl'mūth'ēr), n. A viviparous fish, Zoarces viviparus, of an elongated eel-like form, often confounded with the eel.

eel-oil (ēl'oil), n. An oil obtained from eels, used in lubricating, and as a liniment in rheumatism, etc.

eel-pot (ēl'pōt), n. 1. A kind of basket for catching eels, having fitted into the mouth a funnel-shaped entrance, like that of a wire mouse-trap, composed of flexible willow rods converging inward to a point, so that the eels can easily force their way in, but cannot escape. These baskets are usually attached to a framework of wood erected in a river, especially a tideway river, the large open end of each being opposed to the current of the stream. The eels are thus intercepted on their descent toward the brackish water, which takes place during the autumn. Eel-pots are used in various parts of the Thames in England. In Great Britain called eel-buck.
2. The homely ray, Raja maculata. [Local, Eng.]

eel-pout (ēl'pout), n. [*ME. elepoute (not recorded), < AS. ælepūte (= OD. aelpuyt, also puyt, ael, D. putaal) (L. capito), < æl, eel, + pūte (only in this comp.), pout: see pout¹.] 1. The conger-eel or lamper-eel, Zoarces anguillar, of North America. See lamper-eel.—2. A local English name of the eel-mother or viviparous blenny, Zoarces viviparus.—3. A local English name of the burbot, Lota vulgaris.

eel-punt (ēl'punt), n. A flat-bottomed boat used in fishing for eels.

eel-set (ēl'set), n. A peculiar kind of net used in catching eels.

In Norfolk, where immense quantities of eels are caught every year, the capture is mostly effected by eel-sets, which are nets set across the stream, and in which the sharp-nosed eel is the one almost invariably taken.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX, 258.

eel-shaped (ēl'shāpt), a. Like an eel in shape, long and slender; specifically, anguilliform.

eel-shark (ēl'shārk), n. A shark of the family Chlamydoselachidae.

eel-shear (ēl'shēr), n. An eel-spear.

eelskin (ēl'skin), n. The skin of an eel. Eelskins are used—(a) to cover a squid or artificial bait for Edwardsia beaumonti, about natural size.

Electric Eel (Electrophorus electricus).

catching bluefish, bonitos, etc.; (b) by negroes as a remedy for rheumatism; (c) by sailors as a whip, and in this case called sail eel. (d) Formerly used as a casing for the cue or pignall of the hair or the wig, especially by sailors.

eel-spear (ēl'spēr), n. A forked spear used for catching eels. There are many sizes and styles of the instrument. Special forms of eel-spears are known as prick and dart.

een (ēn), n. An obsolete or Scotch plural of eye. See ee.

e'en¹ (ēn), adv. A contraction of *even*¹. Formerly often written ene.

I have e'en done with you. Sir R. L'Estrange.

e'en² (ēn), n. [Sc.] A contraction of *even*². Formerly often written ene.

-een. [Of. -ene, -ine, -in, etc.] A termination of Latin origin, representing ultimately Latin -enus, -inus, etc., adjective terminations, as in damaskeen, tureen, canteen, sateen, velveteen, etc. See these words.

e'er (ār), adv. A contraction of ever.

This is as strange thing as e'er I look'd on.

Shak., Tempest, v. 1.

-eer. [F. -ier, < L. -arius, etc.: see *-er*¹ and -ier.] A suffix of nouns of agent, being a more English spelling of -ier, equivalent to the older *-er*², as in prisoner, etc. (see *-er*²), as in engineer (formerly engineer), pamphleteer, gazetteer, buccaneer, cannoneer, etc., and, with reference to place of residence, mountaineer, garreteer, etc.

eerie, a. See eery.

eerily (ē'ri-li), adv. In an eery, strange, or unearthly manner.

It spoke in pain and woe; wildly, eerily, urgently.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxxv.

2. Affected by superstitious fear, especially when lonely; nervously timorous.

In mirkiest glen at midnight hour,

I'd rove, and ne'er be eerie.

Burns, My ain kind Dearie, O.

As we sat and talked, it was with an eerie feeling that I felt the very foundations of the land thrill under my feet at every dull boom of the surf on the outward barrier.

H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 13.

eeti. An obsolete preterit of eat. Chaucer.

ef-. An assimilated form of ex- before f.

efagst (ē-fagz'), interj. [Another form of ifacks, ifecks, etc.: see ifecks.] In faith; on my word; certes. [Vulgar.]

"Efags! the gentleman has got a Trayvor," says Mrs. Towhouse; at which they all fell a laughing.

Fielding, Joseph Andrews.

eff (ef), n. Same as *eft*¹.

effable (ef'ā-bl), a. [= It. effabile, < L. effabilis, utterable, < effari, utter, speak out, < ex, out, < fari = Gr. φάω, speak: see fable, fame.] Utterable; capable of being explained; explicable. Barrow.

He did, upon his suggestion, accommodate thereunto his universal language, to make his character effable.

Wallis, Defence of the Royal Society (1678), p. 16.

efface (e-fās'), v. t.; pret. and pp. effaced, ppr. effacing. [F. effacer (= Pr. effassar), efface, < ef for es (< L. ex), out, < face, face.] 1. To erase or obliterate, as something inscribed or cut on a surface; destroy or render illegible; hence, to remove or destroy as if by erasing; as, to efface the letters on a monument; to efface a writing; to efface a false impression from a person's mind.

Efface from his mind the theories and notions vulgarly received. Bacon.

Tho' brass and marble remain, yet the inscriptions are effaced by time, and the imagery moulders away.

Locke, Human Understanding, ii. 10.

From which even the icy touch of death had not effaced all the living beauty.

Sumner, Joseph Story.

2. To keep out of view or unobserved; make inconspicuous; cause to be unnoticed or not noticeable: used reflexively: as, to efface one's self in the midst of gaiety.

That exquisite something called style, which, like the grace of perfect breeding, everywhere pervasive and nowhere emphatic, makes itself felt by the skill with which it effaces itself, and masters us at last with a sense of indefinable completeness.

Lovell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 175.

=Syn. 1. Deface, Erase, Cancel, Expunge, Efface, Obliterate. To deface is to injure, impair, or mar to the eye, and so generally upon the surface: as, to deface a building. The other words agree in representing a blotting out or removal. To erase is to rub out or scratch out, so that the thing is destroyed, although the signs of it may remain: as, to erase a word in a letter. To cancel is to cross out, to deprive of force or validity. To expunge is to strike out; the word is now rarely used, except of the striking out of some record: as, to expunge from the journal a resolution of censure. To efface is to make a complete removal: as, his kindness effaced all memory of past neglect. Obliterate is more emphatic than efface, meaning to remove all sign or trace of.

Like gypsies, lest the stolen brat be known,

Defacing first, then claiming for his own.

Churchill, Apology, l. 236.

Whatever hath been written shall remain,

Nor be erased nor written o'er again.

Longfellow, Morituri Salutamus, l. 168.

The experiences in dreams continually contradict the experiences received during the day; and go far towards cancelling the conclusions drawn from day experiences.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 72.

A universal blank

Of nature's works, to me expunged and rased.

Milton, P. L., iii. 49.

These are the records, half effaced,

Which, with the hand of youth, he traced.

Longfellow, Coplas de Manrique.

The Arabians came like a torrent, sweeping down and obliterating even the landmarks of former civilization.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 8.

effaceable (e-fā'sā-bl), a. [= F. effaçable; as efface + -able.] Capable of being effaced.

effacement (e-fās'ment), n. [= F. effacement; as efface + -ment.] The act of effacing, or the state of being effaced.

effaré (e-fa-rā'), a. [F., pp. of effarer, startle, frighten = Pr. esfarrer, frighten, < L. efferrare, make wild, < efferrus, wild: see efferrus.] In her., same as salient: said of a beast, especially a beast of prey. Also effaré.

effascinate (e-fas'i-nāt), v. t. [F. effascinator, pp. of effascinare, fascinate, < ex- (intensive) + fascinare, charm: see fascinate.] To charm; bewitch; delude; fascinate. Heywood.

effascination (e-fas'i-nā'shon), n. [F. effascination (n.), < effascinare, pp. of effascinare, charm: see effascinate.] The act of bewitching, deluding, or fascinating, or the state of being bewitched or deluded.

St. Paul sets down the just judgement of God against the receivers of Anti-christ, which is effascination, or strong delusion.

Shelford, Learned Discourses (Camb., 1635), p. 317.

effaré, a. In her., same as effaré.

effect (e-fekt'), v. t. [F. effectus, pp. of efficere, efacere, bring to pass, accomplish, complete, do, effect, < ex, out, < facere, do: see fact, and cf. affect, infect.] 1. To produce as a result; be the cause or agent of; bring about; make actual; achieve: as, to effect a political revolution, or a change of government.

What he [the Almighty] decreed,

He effected; man he made, and for him built Magnificent this world. Milton, P. L., ix. 152.

Insects constantly carry pollen from neighboring plants to the stigmas of each flower, and with some species this is effected by the wind. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 248.

Almost anything that ordinary fire can effect may be accomplished at the focus of invisible rays.

Tyndall, Radiation, § 7.

2. To bring to a desired end; bring to pass; execute; accomplish; fulfill: as, to effect a purpose, or one's desires.

If it be in man, besides the king, to effect your suits, here is man shall do it. Shak., W. T., iv. 4.

En his soul seem'd only to direct

So great a body such exploits t' effect.

Daniel, Civil Wars, v.

Being consul, I doubt not t' effect

All that you wish. B. Jonson, Catiline.

=Syn. 1. To realize, fulfil, complete, compass, consummate; Affect, Effect. See *affect*². 2. Execute, Accomplish, etc. See perform.

effect (e-fekt'), n. [ME. effect = D. effect, effekt, = G. effect = Dan. Sw. effekt, < OF. effect, effet, F. effet = Pr. effect = Sp. efecto = Pg. efeito = It. effetto, < L. effectus, an effect, tendency, purpose, < efficere, efacere, pp. of efficere, bring to pass, accomplish, complete, effect: see effect, v.] 1. That which is effected by an efficient cause; a consequent; more generally, the result of any kind of cause except a final cause: as, the effect of heat.

Every argument is either derived from the effects of the matter, of the fourme, or of the efficient cause.

Sir T. Wilson, Rule of Reason.

Causes are as parents to effects.

Bacon, Physical Fables, viii., Expl.

Divers attempts had been made at former courts, and the matter referred to some of the magistrates and some of the elders; but still it came to no effect.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 338.

You have not only been careful of my fortune, which was the effect of your nobleness, but you have been solicitous of my reputation, which is that of your kindness.

Dryden, Account of Annus Mirabilis.

The Turks in the work stood their ground, and fired with terrible effect into the whirlwind that was rushing upon them.

Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 96.

2. Power to produce consequences or results; force; validity; account: as, the obligation is void and of no effect.

Christ is become of no effect unto you.

Gal. v. 4.

3. Purport; import or general intent: as, he immediately wrote to that effect; his speech was to the effect that, etc.

The effect of which seith thus in wordes fewe.

Chaucer, Pity, l. 56.

They spake to her to that effect. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22.

When I the scripture ones or twyes hadde redde, And knewe therof all the hole effects.

Haues.

We quietly and quickly answered him, both what wee were, and whither bound, relating the effect of our Commission.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, II. 42.

4. A state or course of accomplishment or fulfillment; effectuation; achievement; operation: as, to bring a plan into effect; the medicine soon took effect.

Not so worthily to be brought to heroical effect by fortune or necessity.

Sir P. Sidney.

5. Actual fact; reality; not mere appearance: preceded by in.

And these images, wel thou mayest espye,

To the ne to hem-self mowe nought pryfte,

For in effect they beent nat worth a myte.

Chaucer, Second Nun's Tale (ed. Skeat), G. 511.

No other in effect than what it seems.

Sir J. Denham, Cooper's Hill.

6. Mental impression; general result upon the mind of what is apprehended by any of the faculties: as, the effect of a view, or of a picture.

The effect was heightened by the wild and lonely nature of the place.

Irrving.

He carries his love of effect far beyond the limits of moderation.

Macaulay, On History.

I was noting the good effect of the cinnamon-colored lateen-sails against the dazzling white masonry.

T. B. Aldrich, Ponkapog to Peth, p. 218.

In the best age of Greek art the jeweller obtained varied effects by his perfect mastery over the gold itself, and made comparatively little use of such precious stones as were then known, except in rings.

C. T. Newton, Art and Archaeol., p. 395.

7. pl. [After F. effets, effects, chattels, effets mobiliers, movable property; cf. effect, a bill, bill of exchange, effets publics, stocks, funds.] Goods; movables; personal estate. In law: (a) Property; whatever can be turned into money. (b) Personal property.

A few words sufficed to explain everything, and in ten minutes our effects were deposited in the guest's room of the Länsmans house. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 127.

8. The conclusion; the dénouement of a story.

Now to the effect, now to the fruyt of al,

Why I have told this story, and tellen shal.

Chaucer, Good Women, l. 1160.

Effect of a machine, in mech., the useful work performed in some interval of time of definite length.—Form effect, with the design of creating an impression; ostentatiously.—Hall effect, the deflection, within its conductor, of an electric current passing through a magnetic field.—Peltier effect, the heating or cooling of a junction of dissimilar metals by the passage of an electric current.—Thomson effect, the evolution or absorption of heat by an electric current in flowing from one point in a conductor to another at a different temperature.—To give effect to, to make valid; carry out in practice; push to its legitimate or natural result.—To take effect, to operate or begin to operate.—Syn. 1. Effect, Consequence, Result; event, issue. Effect is the closest and strictest of these words, both philosophically and popularly representing the immediate product of a cause: as, every effect must have an adequate cause; the effect of a flash of lightning. A consequence is, in the common use of the word, more remote, and not so closely linked to a cause as effect; it is that which follows. Result may be near or remote; it is often used in the singular to express the sum of the effects or consequences, viewed as making an end.

Find out the cause of this effect. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2.

Consequences are un pitying. Our deeds carry their terrible consequences, quite apart from any fluctuations that went before—consequences that are hardly ever confined to ourselves.

George Eliot, Adam Bede, xvi.

Of what mighty endeavour begun

What results insufficient remain.

Owen Meredith, Epilogue.

7. Goods, Chattels, etc. See property.

effector (e-fek'tér), n. One who or that which effects, produces, or causes. Also effector.

The commemoration of that great work of the creation, and paying homage and worship to that infinite being who was the effector of it.

Derham, Physico-Theology, xi. 6.

effectible (e-fek'ti-bl), a. [F. effect + -ible.] Capable of being done or achieved; practicable; feasible. [Rare.]

Whatever . . . is effectible by the most congruous and efficacious application of actives to passives, is effectible by them.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 338.

effectation (e-fek'shən), n. [= F. effectus, < L. effectio (n-), a doing, effecting, < efficere, pp. effectus, effect: see effect, v.] 1. The act of effecting; creation; production.

But going further into particulars, [Plato] falls into conjectures, attributing the effectation of the soul unto the Great God, but the fabrication of the body to the Di ex Dio, or Angels. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 290.

2. In geom., the construction of a proposition. [Rare in both uses.]—Geometrical effectation, a geometrical problem deducible from some general proposition.

effective (e-fek'tiv), a. and n. [= D. effectief = G. effectiv = Dan. Sw. effektiv, < F. effectif = Pr. effectiu = Sp. efectivo = Pg. efectivo = It. effettivo, < LL. effectivus, < L. effectus, pp. of efficere, effect: see effect, v.] 1. a. 1. Serving to effect the intended purpose; producing the intended or expected effect or result; operative; efficacious: as, an effective cause; effective proceedings.

Though [theaters were] forbidden, after the year 1574, to be open on the Sabbath, the prohibition does not appear to have been effective during the reign of Elizabeth. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., II. 16.

2. Capable of producing effect; fit for action or duty; adapted for a desired end: as, the effective force of an army or of a steam-engine is so much; effective capacity.

Is there not a manifest inconsistency in devolving upon the federal government the care of the general defence, and leaving in the state governments the effective powers by which it is to be provided for?

A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. xxiii.

3. Serving to impress or affect with admiration; producing a decided impression of beauty or a feeling of admiration at the first presentation; impressive; striking; specifically, artistically strong or successful: as, an effective performance; an effective picture.

Nothing can be more effective than the ancient gold which . . . covers the walls of . . . St. Sophia of Kiev, the largest of the ancient Russian cathedrals.

A. J. C. Hare, Russia, ix.

The church of Sebenico is, both inside and out, not only a most remarkable, but a thoroughly effective building.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 93.

4. Actual; real. [A Gallicism.]

The Chinese, whose effective religion, practised at much cost and with great apparent sincerity, is now, as it has been from the earliest times, ancestor-worship.

Quarterly Rev., CLXII. 191.

Effective component of a force. See component.—Effective force. See force.—Effective money, coin, in contradistinction to depreciable paper money.—Effective scale of intercalations, in math., the series of real roots of two functions of x written in order of magnitude after repeated processes of removing pairs of roots belonging, each pair, to either one function, so that the roots of the two functions follow each other alternately.—Syn. Effective, Efficient, Efficacious, Effectual, are not altogether the same in meaning; all imply an object aimed at, and generally a specific object. Effective and efficient are used chiefly where the object is physical. Effective is applied to that which has the power to produce an effect or some effect, or which actually produces or helps to produce some effect: as, the army numbered ten thousand effective men; the bombardment was not very effective; effective revenue. Effective is most clearly separated from the others when representing the power to do, even when that power is not actually in use. Efficient seems the most active of these words: a person is very efficient when very helpful in producing desired results; an efficient cause is one that actually produces a result. Effective and efficient may freely be applied to persons; the others less often. Efficacious is essentially only a stronger word for efficient: as, an efficacious remedy; efficient would not be appropriate with remedy, as implying too much of self-directed activity in the remedy. Effectual, with reference to a result, implies that it is decisive or complete; an effectual stop or cure finishes the business, rendering further work unnecessary.

Precision is the most effective test of affected style as distinct from genuine style. A. Phelps, Eng. Style, p. 115.

The rarity of the visits of efficient bees to this exotic plant (Pisum Sativum) is, I believe, the chief cause of the varieties so seldom intercrossing.

Darwin, Cross and Self Fertilisation, p. 161.

That spirit, that first rush'd on thee

In the camp of Dan,

Be efficacious in thee now at need!

Milton, S. A., I. 1437.

To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual ways of preserving peace.

Washington, Address to Congress, Jan. 8, 1799.

II. n. Milit.: (a) The number of men actually doing duty, or the strength of a company, a regiment, or an army, in the field or on parade.

By the last law which passed the Reichstag with such difficulty the peace-effective was increased by about 42,000 men.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 17.

(b) A soldier fit for duty.

Nevertheless he assembled his army, 20,000 effectives.

The Century, XXIX. 618.

effectively (e-fek'tiv-li), adv. 1. With effect; powerfully; with real operation; completely; thoroughly.

And that thing which maketh a man love the law of God, doth make a man righteous, and justifieth him effectively and actually.

Tynedale, Works, p. 335.

People had been dismissed the camp effectively, finally, and with no possibility of return; but this was the first time that anybody had been introduced ab initio.

Bret Harte, Luck of Roaring Camp.

2. Actually; in fact. [A Gallicism.] effectiveness (e-fek'tiv-ness), n. The quality of being effective.—Syn. Effectiveness, Efficiency, Efficacy, Effectualness. The same differences obtain among these words as among effective, efficient, efficacious, and effectual. (See comparison under effective.) Effectualness is less often used, on account of its awkwardness.

effectless (e-fek'tles), a. [< effect + -less.] Without effect or result; useless; vain.

Sure all's effectless; yet nothing we'll omit

That bears recovery's name. Shak., Pericles, v. 1.

effector (e-fek'tor), n. [= It. effettore, < L. effector, < efficere, pp. effectus, effect: see effect, v.] See effector.

effectress (e-fek'tres), n. [< effector + -ess.] A woman who effects or does. [Rare.]

A Chappell dedicated to the Virgin Mary, . . . reputed an effectress of miracles.

Sandys, Travels, p. 7.

effectual (e-fek'ti-əl), a. [= Sp. effectual (obs.) = It. effettuale, < *ML. effectualis (in adv. effectualiter), < L. effectus (effectus), an effect: see effect, n.] 1. Producing an effect, or the effect desired or intended; also, loosely, having adequate power or force to produce the effect: as, the means employed were effectual.

Their gifts and grants are thereby made effectual both to bar themselves from revocation, and to assure the right they have given.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 62.

The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.

Jas. v. 16.

2. True; veracious.

Reprove my allegation, if you can;

Or else conclude my words effectual.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1.

Effectual adjudication, calling, demand, etc. See the nouns.—Syn. 1. Efficacious, Effectual, etc. (see effective); efficient, successful, complete, thorough.

effectually (e-fek'ti-əl-i), adv. 1. In an effectual manner; with complete effect; so as to produce or secure the end desired; thoroughly: as, the city is effectually guarded.

The Poet with that same hand of delight, doth draw the mind more effectually than any other Arte doth.

Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

I could see it [the story] visibly operate upon his countenance, and effectually interrupt his harangue.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xxvi.

2. Actually; in fact. [A Gallicism.]

Although his charter can not be produced with the formalities used at his creation, . . . yet that he was effectually Earle of Cambridge by the ensuing evidence doth sufficiently appear.

Fuller, Hist. Cambridge Univ., I. 21.

effectualness (e-fek'ti-əl-ness), n. The quality of being effectual.—Syn. See effectiveness.

effectuate (e-fek'ti-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. effectuated, prp. effectuating. [*< ML. effectuatus, pp. of effectuare* (> It. effettuare = Sp. efectuar = Pg. efectuar = F. effectuer, > D. effectuieren = G. effectuieren = Dan. effectuere = Sw. effectuera), give effect to, < L. effectus (effectus), effect: see effect, n.] To bring to pass; accomplish; achieve; effect.

He found him a most fit instrument to effectuate his desire.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, ii.

Where such an unexpected face appears

Of an amazed court, that gazing sat

With a dumb silence (seeming that it fears

The thing it went about t'effectuate).

Daniel, Civil Wars, vii.

In political history it frequently occurs that the man who accidentally has effectuated the purpose of a party is immediately invested by them with all their favourite virtues.

J. D'Iserail, Curios. of Lit., III. 123.

effectuation (e-fek'ti-ā'shən), n. [= Pg. effectuação = It. effettuazione; as effectuate + -ion.] The act of effectuating, bringing to pass, or producing a result.

The ghostly or spiritual effectuation of natural occurrences has ever been and is still the mode of interpretation most readily seized upon by primitive thinking.

Mind, IX. 368.

First of all, we must note the distinction of immanent action and transitive action; the former is what we call action simply, and implies only a single thing, the agent; the latter, which we might with advantage call effectuation, implies two things, i. e., a patient distinct from the agent.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 82.

effectuosity (e-fek'ti-ō-si), a. [< L. as if effectuosus*: see effectuosus.] Same as effectuosus.

effectuously (e-fek'ti-ūs), a. [< OF. effectueux, < L. as if effectuosus*, < effectus (effectus), effect: see effect, n.] Having effect or force; forcible; efficacious; effective. B. Jonson.

For the contempt of the Gospel, shall the wrath of God suffer the Turke and the Pope with strong delusions and effectuose errors to destroy many souls and bodies.

Joye, Expos. of Daniel, xii.

Effectuosus wordes and pithe in sense. Expressa et sensu tincta verba.

Baret, Alvearie, 1580.

effectuously† (e-fek'ti-ūs-li), adv. Effectually; effectively.

O my dear father, Master [atimer], that I could do anything whereby I might effectuously utter my poor heart towards you!

J. Careless, in Bradford's Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 406.

effeir (e-fēr'), v. i. [Sc., also written effere, affer, affer, < OF. afferer, afferer (= Fr. afferir; ML. reflex afferre), be suitable, convenient, < L. afferre, adferre, bring to, assist, be useful to: see afferent.] In Scots law, to be suitable, or belong.

In form as effeirs, means such form as in law belongs to the thing.

Bell.

Effeir of war, warlike guise.

effeminacy (e-fem'i-nā-si), n. [< effeminate: see -cy.] The state or quality of being effeminate; feminine delicacy or weakness; want of manliness; womanishness: commonly applied, in reproach, to men exhibiting such a character.

He tells me, speaking of the horrid effeminacy of the King, that the King hath taken ten times more care and pains in making friends between my Lady Castlemaine and Mrs. Stewart, when they have fallen out, than ever he did to save his kingdom.

Pepys, Diary, III. 168.

The physical organization of the Bengalee is feeble even to effeminacy.

Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

Bacchus nurtured by a girl, and with the soft, delicate limbs of a woman, was the type of a disgraceful effeminacy.

Lecky, Rationalism, I. 243.

But foul effeminacy held me yoked
Her bond slave.

Milton, S. A., I. 410.

effeminate† (e-fem'i-nāt), v.; pret. and pp. effeminated, prp. effeminating. [< L. effeminatus, pp. of effeminare (> It. effeminare, effeminare = Sp. efeminar (obs.) = Pg. effeminar = Pr. efeminar = F. efféminer), make womanish, < ex, out, + femina, a woman: see feminine.] 1. trans. To make womanish; unman; weaken.

More resolute courages, then the Persians or Indians, effeminated with wealth & peace, could afford.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 399.

And thou dost nourish him a lock of hair behind like a girl, effeminating thy son even from the very cradle.

Evelyn, Golden Book of Chrysostome.

Thou art as hard to shake off as that flattering effeminating Mischief, Love.

Wycherley, Plain Dealer, iii. 1.

II. intrans. To grow womanish or weak; melt into weakness.

In a slothful peace, both courages will effeminate, and manners corrupt.

Bacon, True Greatness of Kingdoms and Estates (ed. 1887).

effeminate (e-fem'i-nāt), a. [= F. efféminé = Pg. effeminado = It. effeminato, effeminato, < L. effeminatus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. Having the qualities of the female sex; soft or delicate to an unmanly degree; womanish: applied to men.

The king, by his voluptuous life and mean marriage, became effeminate and less sensible of honour.

Bacon.

A woman impudent and mannish grown
Is not more loath'd than an effeminate man.

Shak., T. and C., iii. 3.

I have heard sometimes men of reputed ability join in with that effeminate plaintive tone of invective against critics.

Shaftebury, Misc., III. 1.

Be manly then, though mild, for, sure as fate,
Thou art, my Stephen, too effeminate.

Crabbe, Works, V. 240.

2. Characterized by or resulting from effeminacy: as, an effeminate peace; an effeminate life.

effeminately (e-fem'i-nāt-li), adv. In an effeminate manner; womanishly; weakly.

With golden pendants in his ears,
Aloft the silken reins he bears,
Proud, and effeminately gay.

Faukes, tr. of Anacreon's Odes, lxxx.

Effeminately vanquish'd: by which means,
Now blind, dishearten'd, shamed, dishonour'd, quell'd,
To what can I be useful?

Milton, S. A., I. 562.

effeminateness (e-fem'i-nāt-ness), n. The state of being effeminate; unmanly softness.

The indulgent softness of the parent's family is apt, at best, to give young persons a most unhappy effeminateness.
Secker, Works, I. i.

effemination (e-fem-i-nā'shon), n. [= F. effemination = Pg. effeminação = It. effeminazione, < LL. effeminatio (n.), < L. effeminare, pp. effeminatus, make womanish: see effeminate, v.] The state of being or the act of making effeminate.

But from this mixture of sexes . . . degenerate effemination.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., viii. 17.

effeminize (e-fem'i-nīz), v. t. [As effemin-ate + -ize.] To make effeminate.

Brave knights effeminized by sloth.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas.

effendi (e-fen'di), n. [Turk. efendi, a gentleman, a master (of servants), a patron, protector, a prince of the blood (efendim, 'my master,' in address equiv. to E. sir), < NGR. aḡēvny (pron. āfen'dēs), a lord, master, a vernacular form of Gr. (also NGR.) αἰθνήτης (in NGR. pron. āthen'dēs), an absolute master: see authentic.] A title of respect given to gentlemen in Turkey, equivalent to Mr. or sir, following the name when used with one.

I assumed the polite and pliant manners of an Indian physician, and the dress of a small Effendi, still, however, representing myself to be a Dervish.

R. F. Burton, El-Medina, p. 52.

efferation, n. [< LL. effratio (n.), a making wild or savage, < L. effrare, pp. effractus, make wild or savage, < effrus, very wild, fierce, savage: see effrout.] A making wild. Bailey, 1727.

effluent (ef'e-runt), a. and n. [= F. effluent, < L. effluent (t-s), pp. of efferre, efferre, bring or carry out, < ex, out, + ferre = E. bear.] 1. a. Conveying outward or away; deferent: as, the effluent nerves, which convey a nervous impulse from the ganglionic center outward to the muscles or other active tissue. In the system of blood-vessels the arteries are the effluent vessels, conveying blood from the heart to all parts of the body, while the veins are the afferent vessels, bringing blood to the heart. In any gland or glandular system the vessel which takes up and carries off a secretion is effluent.—Effluent duct. Same as deferent canal (which see, under deferent).

II. n. 1. In anat. and physiol., a vessel or nerve which conveys outward.—2. A river flowing from and bearing away the waters of a lake.

efforust (ef'e-rus), a. [< L. effrus, very wild, fierce, savage, < ex (intensive) + ferus, wild, fierce: see fierce.] Very wild or savage; fierce; ferocious: as, an efforust beast.

From the teeth of that efforust beast, from the tusk of the wild boar.
Sp. King, Vitis Palatina, p. 34.

effervesce (ef-er-ves'), v. i.; pret. and pp. effervesced, pp. effervescent. [< L. effervesce, boil up, foam up, < ex, out, + fervere, begin to boil, < fervere, boil: see fervent.] 1. To be in a state of natural ebullition, like liquor when gently boiling; bubble and hiss, as fermenting liquors or any fluid when some part escapes in a gaseous form; work, as new wine.

The compound spirit of nitre, put to oil of cloves, will effervesce, even to a flame.
Mead, Poisons.

2. Figuratively, to show signs of excitement; exhibit feelings which cannot be suppressed: as, to effervesce with joy.

Have I proved . . .
That Revelation and new admits
The natural man may effervesce in ire,
O'erflood earth, o'erfroth heaven with foamy rage,
At the first puncture to his self-respect?
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 85.

Effervescing draught. See draught.

effervescence, effervescency (ef-er-ves' ens, -en-si), n. [= F. effervescence = Sp. effervescencia = Pg. effervescencia = It. effervescenza, < L. effervescent (t-s), pp. of effervescent.] 1. Natural ebullition; that commotion of a fluid which takes place when some part of the mass flies off in a gaseous form, producing small bubbles: as, the effervescence or working of new wine, cider, or beer; the effervescence of a carbonate with nitric acid, in consequence of chemical action and decomposition producing carbon dioxide or carbonic-acid gas.—2. Figuratively, strong excitement; manifestation of feeling.

The wild gas, the fixed air, is plainly broke loose: but we ought to suspend our judgment until the first effervescence is a little subsided.
Burke, Rev. in France.

We postpone our literary work until we have more ripeness and skill to write, and we one day discover that our literary talent was a youthful effervescence which we have now lost.
Emerson, Old Age.

=Syn. See ebullition.
effervescent (ef-er-ves' ent), a. [= F. effervescent = Sp. effervescente = Pg. It. effervescente, < L. effervescent (t-s), pp. of effervesce, boil up:

see effervesce.] Effervescing; having the property of effervescence; of a nature to effervesce.
effervescible (ef-er-ves' i-bl), a. [< effervesce + -ible.] Capable of effervescing.

A small quantity of effervescible matter.
Kirwan.

effervescive (ef-er-ves' iv), a. [< effervesce + -ive.] Producing or tending to produce effervescence: as, an effervescive force. Hickok. [Rare.]

effet (ef' et), n. A dialectal form of efft.

effete (e-fēt'), a. [Formerly also effate; < L. effetus, improp. effatus, that has brought forth, exhausted by bearing, worn out, effete, < ex, out, + fetus, that has brought forth: see fetus.] 1. Past bearing; functionless, as a result of age or exhaustion.

It is . . . probable that the females as well of beasts as birds have in them . . . the seeds of all the young they will afterwards bring forth, which, . . . all spent and exhausted, . . . the animal becomes barren and effete.
Ray, Works of Creation, i.

Hence—2. Having the energies worn out or exhausted; become incapable of efficient action; barren of results.

All that can be allowed him now is to refresh his decrepit, effete sensuality with the history of his former life.
South, Sermons.

If they find the old governments effete, worn out, . . . they may seek new ones.
Burke.

Islamism . . . as a proselyting religion . . . has long been practically effete.
Quarterly Rev., CLXIII. 141.

=Syn. 1. Unproductive, unfruitful, unprolific.—2. Spent, worn out.

effeteness (e-fēt' nes), n. The state of being effete; exhaustion; barrenness.

What would have been the result to mankind . . . if the hope of the world's rejuvenescence had been met solely by that effeteness of corruption (the old Roman empire)?
Buckle, Civilization, I. 221.

efficacious (ef-i-kā'shus), a. [< OF. efficaceur, equiv. to efficace, F. efficace = Pr. efficaci = Sp. eficaz = Pg. eficaz = It. efficace, < L. efficac (cac), efficacious, < efficere, effect, accomplish, do: see effect, v.] Producing the desired effect; having power adequate to the purpose intended; effectual in operation or result.

The mode which he adopted was at once prudent and efficacious.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 82.

He knew his Rome, what wheels we set to work;
Plied influential folk, pressed to the ear
Of the efficacious purple.

Browning, Ring and Book, I. 144.

=Syn. Efficient, Effectual, etc. (see effective); active, operative, energetic.

efficaciously (ef-i-kā'shus-li), adv. In an efficacious manner; effectually.

It (torture) does so efficaciously convince That . . . out of each hundred cases, by my count, Never I knew of patients beyond four Withstand its taste. Browning, Ring and Book, II. 74.

efficaciousness (ef-i-kā'shus-ness), n. The quality of being efficacious; efficacy.

The efficaciousness of these means is sufficiently known and acknowledged.
Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 5.

efficacy (ef-i-kā'si), n. [= F. efficace = Pr. eficacia = Sp. eficacia = Pg. It. efficacia, < L. efficac (cac), efficacy, < efficaz, efficacious: see efficacious.] The quality of being efficacious or effectual; production of, or the capacity of producing, the effect intended or desired; effectiveness.

This hath ever made me suspect the efficacy of relics.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 28.

Planetary motions, and aspects,
In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite,
Of noxious efficacy.
Milton, P. L., x. 660.

Even were Gray's claims to being a great poet rejected, he can hardly be classed with the many, so great and uniform are the efficacy of his phrase and the music to which he sets it.
Lovell, New Princeton Rev., I. 177.

=Syn. Efficiency, etc. (see effectiveness); virtue, force, energy.

efficient (e-fish' ens), n. Same as efficiency.
efficiency (e-fish' en-si), n. [= Sp. eficiencia = Pg. eficiencia = It. efficienza, < L. efficiencia, efficiency, < efficient (t-s), efficient: see efficient.] The quality of being efficient; effectual agency; competent power; the quality or power of producing desired or intended effects.

The manner of this divine efficiency being far above us.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

Truth is properly no more than Contemplation; and her utmost efficiency is but teaching.
Milton, Elkonoklastes, xxviii.

Causes which should carry in their mere statement evidence of their efficiency.
J. S. Mill, Logic, III. v. 9.
Specifically—(a) The state of being able or competent; the state of possessing or having acquired adequate knowledge or skill in any art, profession, or duty: as, by patient perseverance he has attained a high degree of efficiency. (b) In mech., the ratio of the useful work performed by a prime motor to the energy expended. =Syn. Efficacy, etc. See effectiveness.

efficient (e-fish' ent), a. and n. [= F. efficient = Pr. eficiente = Sp. eficiente = Pg. It. efficiente, < L. efficien (t-s), pp. of efficere, effect, accomplish, etc.: see effect, v.] I. a. 1. Producing outward effects; of a nature to produce a result; active; causative.

If one flower is fertilised with pollen which is more efficient than that applied to the other flowers on the same peduncle, the latter often drop off.

Darwin, Cross and Self Fertilisation, p. 399.

2. Acting or able to act with due effect; adequate in performance; bringing to bear the requisite knowledge, skill, and industry; capable; competent: as, an efficient workman, director, or commander.

Every healthy and efficient mind passes a large part of life in the company most easy to him.
Emerson, Clubs.

Efficient cause, a cause which brings about something external to itself: distinguished from material and formal cause by being external to that which it causes, and from the end or final cause in being that by which something is made or done, and not merely that for the sake of which it is made or done. The conception of efficient cause antedates that of physical force in the scientific sense; and the latter finds no place in the Aristotelian division of causes. But many writers of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries extend the meaning of efficient cause to include forces. Other and inferior writers, since the Aristotelian philosophy has ceased to form an essential part of a liberal education, use the phrase efficient cause in imitation of older writers, but without any distinct apprehension of its meaning, probably in the sense of effectual cause. (See the citation from Lecky below.) Efficient causes are traditionally divided into various classes: 1st, into active and emanative: thus, fire is said to be the emanative cause of its own heat and the active cause of heat in other bodies; 2d, into immanent and transient: an immanent cause brings about some modification of itself (it is, nevertheless, regarded as external, because it does not produce itself); 3d, into free and necessary; 4th, into cause by itself and cause by accident: thus, if a man in digging a well finds a treasure, he is the cause per se of the well being dug, and the cause by accident of the discovery of the treasure; 5th, into absolute and adjunct, the latter being again divided into principal and secondary, and secondary into procatartical, prequential, and instrumental (the procatartical extrinsically excites the principal cause to action, the prequential internally disposes the principal cause to action); 6th, into first and second; 7th, into universal and particular; 8th, into proximate and remote. Medical men follow Galen in dividing the efficient causes of disease into predisposing, exciting, and determining.

Every politician knew that the interference of the sovereign during the debate in the House of Lords was the efficient cause of the change of Ministry.

Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xv.

=Syn. Efficacious, Effectual, etc. (see effective); energetic, operative, active, ready, helpful.

II. n. 1. An efficient cause (see above).

God, which moveth mere natural agents as an efficient only, doth otherwise move intellectual creatures, and especially his holy angels.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 4.

Excepting God, nothing was before it: and therefore it could have no efficient in nature.

Bacon, Physical Fables, viii., Expl.

O, but, say such, had not a woman been the tempter and efficient to our fall, we had not needed a redemption.
Ford, Honour Triumphant, i.

Some are without efficient, as God.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 14.

2. One who is efficient or qualified; specifically, in the volunteer service of Great Britain, one who has attended the requisite number of drills, and in respect of whom the corps receives the capitulation grant paid by government.—3. In math., a quantity multiplied by another quantity to produce the quantity of which it is said to be an efficient; a factor.—Extra efficient, a commissioned officer or sergeant of volunteers in the British army who has obtained an official certificate of competency. Extra efficients earn an extra grant for their company.

efficiently (e-fish' ent-li), adv. In an efficient manner; effectively.

God, when He is stilled Father, must always be understood to be a true and proper cause, really and efficiently giving life.
Clarke, The Trinity, ii. § 13, note.

efficiation, n. [< L. efficiō (n.), a representation (in rhet.) of corporal peculiarities, < effingere, pp. effictus, form, fashion, represent: see effigy.] A fashioning; a representation. Bailey, 1727.

effiercer (e-fers'), v. t. [< ef + fierce, after L. effere, make fierce, < efferus, very fierce: see efforust.] To make fierce or furious.

With fell woodness he effierced was,
And wilfully him throwing on the grass
Did beat and bounce his head and breast full sore.
Spenser, F. Q., III. xi. 27.

effigial (e-fij' i-al), a. [< F. effigial; as effigy + -al.] Pertaining to or exhibiting an effigy. [Rare.]

The three volumes contain chiefly effigial cuts and monumental figures and inscriptions.

Critical Hist. of Pamphlets.

effigiate (e-fij' i-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. effigiated, pp. effigiated. [< LL. effigiatus, pp. of effigiare (> It. effigiare = Pr. effigiar = F. effigier), form, fashion, < effigies, an image, likeness: see effigy. To make into an effigy of something; form into a like figure. [Rare.]

He who means to win souls . . . must, as St. Paul did, effigiate and conform himself to those circumstances of living and discourse by which he may prevail.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 754.

effigiation (e-fij-i-ā'shōn), n. [effigiate + -ion.]

1. The act of forming in resemblance. Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]—2. That which is formed in resemblance; an image or effigy. [Rare.]

No such effigiation was therein discovered, which some nineteen weeks after became visible.

Fuller, Ch. Hist., X. ii. 53.

effigies (e-fij-i-ēz), n. [L.: see effigy.] An effigy.

This same Dagoberts monument I saw there, and under his effigies this Epitaph.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 46.

We behold the species of eloquence in our minds, the effigies or actual image of which we seek in the organs of our hearing. Dryden, tr. of Dufresnoy's Art of Painting.

effigurate (e-fij-ū-rāt), a. [L. ex, out, + figuratus, pp. of figurare, figure, < figura, a figure: see figuratus.] In bot., having a definite form or figure: applied to lichens: opposed to effuse.

effigy (ef-i-jī), n.; pl. effigies (-jiz).

[Formerly also effigie, and, as L., effigies; = F. effigie = Sp. efigie = Pg. It. effigie, < L. effigies, effigia, a copy or imitation of an object, an image, likeness, < effingere, pp. effictus, form, fashion, represent, < ex, out, + ingere (fig-), form: see feign, fiction.] A representation or imitation of any object, in whole or in part; an image or a representation of a person, whether of the whole figure, the bust, or the head alone; a likeness in sculpture, painting, or drawing; a portrait: most frequently applied to the figures on sepulchral monuments, and popularly to figures made up of stuffed clothing, etc., to represent obnoxious persons.

A choice library, over which are the effigies of most of our late men of polite literature.

Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 21, 1644.

The abbey church of St. Denis possesses the largest collection of French 13th-century monumental effigies.

Encyc. Brit., XXI. 563.

A chair of state was placed on it, and in this was seated an effigy of King Henry, clad in sable robes and adorned with all the insignia of royalty. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., I. 3.

To burn or hang in effigy, to burn or hang an image or a picture of (a person), either as a substitute for actual burning or hanging (formerly practised by judicial authorities as a vicarious punishment of a condemned person who had escaped their jurisdiction), or, as at the present time, as an expression of dislike, hatred, or contempt: a mode in which public antipathy or indignation is often manifested.

This night the youths of the City burnt the Pope in effigy.

Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 5, 1673.

efflagitate (e-flaj-i-tāt), v. t. [L. efflagitatus, pp. of efflagitare, demand urgently, < ex (intensive) + flagitare, demand.] To demand earnestly. Coles, 1717.

efflate (e-flāt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. efflated, pp. efflating. [L. efflatus, pp. of efflare, blow or breathe out, < ex, out, + flare = E. blow.] To fill with breath or air; inflate. [Rare.]

Our common spirits, efflated by every vulgar breath upon every act, deify themselves.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 179.

efflation (e-flā'shōn), n. [= OF. efflation, < L. as if efflatio(n), < efflare, pp. efflatus, blow or breathe out: see efflate.] The act of breathing out or puffing; a puff, as of wind.

A soft efflation of celestial fire

Came, like a rushing breeze, and shook the lyre.

Parnell, Gift of Poetry.

effleurage (e-flé-rāzh'), n. [F., grazing, touching, < effleurer, graze, touch: see efflower.] Gentle superficial rubbing (of a patient) with the palm of the hand.

effloresce (ef-lō-res'), v. i.; pret. and pp. effloresced, pp. efflorescing. [= Sp. eflorescer, < L. efflorescere, ineptive form (later in simple form, L.L. efflorere), blossom, < ex (intensive) + florere, blossom, flower, < flor (flor-), a flower: see flower.] 1. To burst into bloom, as a plant.

The Italian [Gothic architecture] effloresced . . . into the meaningless ornamentation of the Certosa of Pavia and the cathedral of Como.

Ruskin.

2. To present an appearance of flowering or bursting into bloom; specifically, to become covered with an efflorescence; become incrustated with crystals of salt or the like.

The walls of limestone caverns sometimes effloresce with nitrate of lime in consequence of the action of nitric acid formed in the atmosphere.

Dana.

3. In chem., to change either throughout or over the surface to a whitish, mealy, or crystalline powder, from a gradual decomposition, on simple exposure to the air; become covered with a whitish crust or light crystallization, in the form of short threads or spiculae, from a slow chemical change between some of the ingredients of the matter covered and an acid proceeding commonly from an external source.

As the surface [of a puddle of water] dries, the capillary action draws the moisture up pieces of broken earth, dead sticks, and tufts of grass, where the salt effloresces.

Darwin, Geol. Observations, ii. 307.

efflorescence (ef-lō-res-ens), n. [= F. efflorescencia = Sp. eflorescencia = Pg. efflorescencia = It. efflorescenza, < L. efflorescent(-t), pp. r.: see efflorescent.] 1. The act of efflorescing or blossoming out; also, an aggregation of blossoms, or an appearance resembling or suggesting a mass of flowers.

As the sky is supposed to scatter its golden star-pollen once every year in meteoric showers, so the dome of St. Peter's has its annual efflorescence of fire.

Lovell, Fireside Travels, p. 299.

2. In bot., the time or state of flowering; anthesis.—3. In med., a redness of the skin; a rash; eruption, as in measles, smallpox, scarlatina, etc.—4. In chem., the formation of small white threads or spiculae, resembling the sublimated matter called flowers, on the surface of certain bodies, as salts, or on the surface of any permeable body or substance; the incrustation so formed.

efflorescency (ef-lō-res-en-si), n. 1. The state or condition of being efflorescent.—2. An efflorescence.

Two white, sparry incrustations, with efflorescencies in form of shrubs, formed by the trickling of water.

Woodward, Fossils.

efflorescent (ef-lō-res-ent), a. [= F. efflorescent = Sp. eflorescent = Pg. It. efflorescente, < L. efflorescent(-t), pp. r. of efflorescere, blossom: see effloresce.] 1. Blooming; being in flower.—2. Apt to effloresce; subject to efflorescence: as, an efflorescent salt.—3. Covered or incrustated with efflorescence.

Yellow efflorescent sparry incrustations on stone.

Woodward, Fossils.

efflower (e-flou-er), v. t. [An erroneous accom. (as if < ef- + flower) of F. effleur, graze, touch, touch upon, strip the leaves off, < ef- for es- (< L. ex), out, + fluer (in the phrase a fleur de, on a level with), < G. flur, plain, = E. floor.] In leather-manuf., to remove the outer surface of (a skin). See the extract.

The skins (chamois-leather) are first washed, limed, fleeced, and branned. They are next efflowered—that is, deprived of their epidermis by a concave knife, blunt in its middle part—upon the convex horsebeam.

Ure, Dict., III. 87.

effluence (ef-lō-ens), n. [= F. effluence = Sp. efluencia = Pg. efluencia, < NL. effluentia, < L. effluen(-t), flowing out: see effluent.] 1. The act of flowing out; outflow; emanation.—2. That which issues or flows out; an efflux; an emanation.

Bright effluence of bright essence increate.

Milton, P. L., iii. 6.

From this bright Effluence of his Deed

They borrow that reflected Light

With which the lasting Lamp they feed.

Prior, Carmen Seculare (1700), st. 35.

And, as if the gloom of the earth and sky had been but the effluence of these two mortal hearts, it vanished with their sorrow.

Hawthorne, Scarlet Letter, xviii.

Grant that an unnamed virtue or delicate vital effluence is always ascending from the earth.

The Atlantic, LVIII. 428.

effluency (ef-lō-en-si), n. Same as effluence.
effluent (ef-lō-ent), a. and n. [= F. effluent = Sp. efluente = Pg. efluente, < L. effluen(-t), pp. r. of effluere, flow out, < ex, out, + fluere, flow: see fluent. Cf. affluent, influent, refluent, etc.] 1. a. Flowing out; emanating.

Dazzling the brightness; not the sun so bright,
'Twas here the pure substantial fount of light;
Shot from his hand and side in golden streams,
Came forward effluent horny-pointed beams.

Parnell, Gift of Poetry.

II. n. 1. That which flows out or issues forth.

A number of specimens of waste liquors from factories, with the residual matters pressed into cakes, and also of the purified effluents, are exhibited.

Sci. Amer. Supp., No. 446.

2. Specifically, in geog., a stream that flows out of another stream or out of a lake: as, the Atchafalaya is an effluent of the Mississippi river.

—3. In math., a covariant of a quantie of degree mn in i variables, the covariant being of degree m and in p variables, where p is the number of permutations that can be obtained by dividing n into i parts. Sylvester, 1853.

effluvia, n. Plural of effluvium.

effluvia (e-flū-vi-ā-bl), a. [effluvia + -able.] Capable of being given off in the form of effluvium. [Rare.]

The great rapidity with which the wheels that serve to cut and polish diamonds must be moved does excite a great degree of heat . . . in the stone, and by that and the strong concussion it makes of its parts, may force it to spend its effluvia matter, if I may call it so.

Boyle, Works, IV. 354.

effluvial (e-flū-vi-āl), a. [effluvia + -al.]

Pertaining to effluvia; containing effluvia.

effluvia (e-flū-vi-āt), v. i.; pret. and pp. effluviated, pp. effluviating. [effluvia + -ate.] To throw off effluvium. [Rare.]

What an eminent physician, who was skilled in perfumes, affirmed to me about the durability of an effluviating power.

Boyle, Works, V. 47.

effluvium (e-flū-vi-um), n.; pl. effluvia (-ā). [= F. effluve = Sp. efluvio = Pg. It. effluvio, < L. effluviu, a flowing out, an outlet, < effluere, flow out: see effluent.] A subtle or invisible exhalation; an emanation: especially applied to noxious or disagreeable exhalations: as, the effluvia from diseased bodies or putrefying animal or vegetable substances.

Besides its electric attraction, which is made by a sulphureous effluviu, it will strike fire upon percussion.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 1.

efflux (ef-luks), n. [= Sp. (obs.) eflujo = It. efflusso, < L. as if effluxus, n., < effluere, pp. effluxus, flow out: see effluent.] 1. The act or state of flowing out or issuing in a stream; effusion; effluence; flow: as, an efflux of matter from an ulcer. The rate of efflux of a fluid is roughly calculated by Torricelli's theorem, that the velocity at the orifice is the same as if each particle had fallen freely from the level of the fluid in the vessel. But, owing to the converging motion, the area of the orifice is greater than the section of the stream, while the pressure is increased, so that the efflux is less than the amount given by Torricelli's theorem.

It is no wonder, if God can torment where we see no tormentor, and comfort where we behold no comfort; he can do it by immediate emanations from himself, by continual effluces of those powers and virtues which he was pleased to implant in a weaker and fainter measure in created agents.

South, Works, VIII. xiv.

2. That which flows out; an emanation, effusion, or effluence.

Prime cheerer, Light!

Of all material beings, first and best!

Efflux divine! Thomson, Summer, I. 92.

Whatever talents may be, if the man create not, the pure efflux of the Deity is not his; clinders and smoke there may be, but not yet flame.

Emerson, Misc., p. 78.

Beryllus (who was a precursor of Apollinarianism) taught that in the Person of Christ, after His nativity as Man, there was a certain efflux of the divine essence, so that He had no reasonable human soul.

Ep. Chr. Wordsworth, Church Hist., I. 291.

efflux (e-fluks'), v. i. [L. effluxus, pp.: see the noun.] To flow out or away.

Five years being effluxed, he took out the tree and weighed it.

Boyle, Works, I. 496.

effluxion (e-fluk'shōn), n. [= F. effluxion = Sp. (obs.) eflusion, < L. as if effluxio(n), (ML. also sometimes spelled effluctio), < effluere, pp. effluxus, flow out: see efflux.] 1. The act of flowing out.—2. That which flows out; an emanation. [Rare.]

There are some light effluxions from spirit to spirit, when men are one with another; as from body to body. Bacon.

The effluxions penetrate all bodies, and like the species of visible objects are ever ready in the medium, and lay hold on all bodies proportionate or capable of their action.

Sir T. Browne, Concerning the Loadstone.

effodient (e-fō-di-ent), a. [L. effodient(-t), pp. r. of effodire, dig out, dig up, < ex, out, + fodire, dig: see fossil.] In zool., habitually digging; fossorial; fodient.

Effodientia (e-fō-di-en'shi-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. effodient(-t), digging: see effodient.] A division of edentate mammals, including insectivorous forms, most of which are effodient or fossorial, as the armadillos, anteaters, aardvarks, and pangolins: a term now superseded by Fodientia, and restricted to the African fossorial ant-eaters, as the aardvarks.

effete, a. An obsolete spelling of effete.

effoliation (e-fō-lī-ā'shōn), n. [Var. of exfoliation.] In bot., the removal or fall of the foliage of a plant.

efforce (e-fōrs'), v. t. [F. efforcer, endeavor, strive, = Pr. esforzar = Sp. esforzar = Pg. esforçar, force, also endeavor, = It. sforzare, force, red. endeavor, < ML. effortiare, efforciare, exforciare, force, compel, efforciare, endeavor, < L. ez, out, off, + fortis, strong: see force.] Cf. afforce, deforce.] To force; violate.

Burnt his beasty heart t' efforce her chastity.
Spenser, F. Q.

efforced, a. [Efforce + -ed.] Forceful; imperative.

Again he heard a more efforced voyce,
That bad him come in haste.

Spenser, F. Q., II. viii. 4.

efform (e-fōrm'), v. t. [= It. efformare, < L. ez, out, + formare, form.] To fashion; shape; form.

Merciful and gracious, thou gavest us being, raised us from nothing, . . . efforming us after thy own image.

Jer. Taylor.

efformation (ef-fōr-mā'shōn), n. [Efform + -ation.] The act of giving shape or form; formation.

Pretending to give an account of the production and efformation of the universe. Ray, Works of Creation, I.

effort (ef'ört or -ért), n. [F. effort, OF. efort, esfort = Pr. esfort = Sp. esfuero = Pg. esforço = It. sforzo, an effort; verbal n. of the verb (ML. effortiare) represented by effort, v., and efforce: see effort, v., and efforce.] 1. Voluntary exertion; a putting forth of the will, consciously directed toward the performance of any action, external or internal, and usually prepared by a psychological act of "gathering the strength" or coordination of the powers. A voluntary action, not requiring such preparation, is, both in the terminology of psychology and in ordinary language, said to be performed without effort.

It is more even by the effort and tension of mind required, than by the mere loss of time, that most readers are repelled from the habit of careful reading.

De Quincy, Style, I.

We could never listen for a quarter of an hour to the speaking of Sir James, without feeling that there was a constant effort, a tug up hill.

Macaulay, Sir James Mackintosh.

2. The result of exertion; something done by voluntary exertion; specifically, a literary, oratorical, or artistic work.

In your more serious efforts, he says, your bombast would be less tolerable if the thoughts were ever suited to the expression.

Sheridan, The Critic, I. 1.

3. In mech., a force upon a body due to a definite cause. Thus, a heavy body on an inclined plane is said to have an effort to fall vertically. Also, the effective component of a force.—Center of effort. See center.—Effort of nature (a phrase introduced by Sydenham), the concurrence of physiological processes tending toward the expulsion of morbid matter from the system.

—Mean effort, a constant force which applied to a particle tangentially to its trajectory would produce the same total work as a given variable force.—Sense of effort, the feeling which accompanies an exertion of the will, by which we are made aware of having put forth force. It is held by some psychologists to accompany all sensations, since, as they say, all sensation produces an immediate reaction of the will.—Syn. Attempt, trial, essay, struggle.

effort (ef'ört or -ért), v. t. [ML. effortiare, strengthen (cf. confortare, strengthen: see confort, v.), also compel, force: see effort, n., to which the verb conforms. Cf. efforce.] To strengthen; reinforce.

He efforted his spirits with the remembrance and relation of what formerly he had been and what he had done.

Fuller, Worthies, Cheshire.

effortless (ef'ört-les or -ért-les), a. [Effort + -less.] Making no effort.

But idly to remain
Were yielding effortless, and waiting death.

Southey, Thalaba, iv.

effossion (e-fōsh'ōn), n. [LL. effossio (n.), a digging out, < L. effodire, pp. effossus, dig out: see effodient.] The act of digging out of the earth; exfoliation. [Rare.]

He . . . set apart annual sums for the recovery of manescripts, the effossions of coins, and the procuring of nummies.

Martinius Scriblerus, I.

effracture (e-frak'tūr), n. [LL. effractura, a breaking (only in ref. to housebreaking), < efringere, pp. effractus, break, break open, < ez, out, + frangere, break: see fracture, fracture.] In surg., a fracture of the cranium with depression of the broken bone.

effranchise (e-fran'chiz), v. t. pret. and pp. effranchised, pp. effranchising. [OF. effranchiss-, effranchiss-, stem of certain parts of effrancher, esfrancher, affranchise, < es- (< L. ez, out) + franchir, free: see franchise. Cf. affranchise.] To invest with franchises or privileges. [Rare.]

effray (e-frā'), v. t. [F. effrayer, frighten: see affray (of which effray is a doublet) and afraid.] Same as affray.

Their dam upstart, out of her den effrayde,
And rushed forth.

Spenser, F. Q., I. i. 16.

effrayable (e-frā'-a-bl), a. [Effray + -able.] Frightful; dreadful. Harvey.

effrayant (e-frā'ant), a. [F., pp. of effrayer, frighten: see effray and ant.] Frightful; alarming.

The frontal sinus, or the projection over the eyebrows, is largely developed [in the microcephalous idiot], and the jaws are prognathous to an effrayant degree.

Darwin, Descent of Man, I. 117.

effrayé (e-frā-yā'), a. [F., pp. of effrayer, frighten: see effray.] In her., same as rampant.

effrenation (ef-rē-nā'shōn), n. [L. effrenatio (n.), < effrenare, pp. effrenatus, unbridle, < ez, out, + frenare, bridle, < frenum, a bridle.] Unbridled rashness or license; unruliness. Glossographia Aug., 1707.

effront (e-frunt'), v. t. [LL. effron (t-s), barefaced, shameless, < L. ez, out, + fron (t-s), front, forehead: see front and affront.] To treat with effrontery. Sir T. Browne.

effronted (e-frunt'ed), a. [Also effrontit (prop. Sc.); = F. effronté = Pr. esfrontat = It. sfrontato, < L. as if effrontatus*], < LL. effron (t-s), shameless: see effront.] Characterized by or indicating effrontery; brazen-faced.

Th' effronted whore prophetically shovne
By Holy John in his mysterious scrouls.

Stirling, Doomesday, The Second Houre.

effrontery (e-frun'tēr-i), n. [OF. effronterie (F. effronterie), < effronte, shameless, < LL. effron (t-s), barefaced, shameless: see effront.] Assurance; shamelessness; sauciness; impudence or boldness in transgressing the bounds of modesty, propriety, duty, etc.: as, the effrontery of vice; their corrupt practices were pursued with bold effrontery.

A touch of audacity, altogether short of effrontery, and far less approaching to vulgarity, gave as it were a wildness to all that she did.

Scott, The Abbot, iv.

I am not a little surprised at the easy effrontery with which political gentlemen, in and out of Congress, take it upon them to say that there are not a thousand men in the North who sympathize with John Brown.

Emerson, John Brown.

—Syn. Impertinence, etc. (see impudence); hardness, audacity. See list under impertinence.

effrontuously (e-frun'tū-us-li), adv. [effrontuoso* (cf. OF. effronteuze) (irreg. < LL. effron (t-s), shameless, + -uoso) + -ly.] With effrontery; impudently.

He most effrontuously affirms the slander.

Roger North, Examen, p. 28.

effulcrate (e-ful'krāt), a. [*NL. effulcratus, < L. ez, out, + fulcrum, a support.] In bot., not subtended by a leaf or bract: said of a bud from below which the leaf has fallen.

effulge (e-ful'j), v.; pret. and pp. effulgenced, pp. effulgere, shine forth, < ez, forth, + fulgere, shine: see fulgent.] 1. trans. To cause to shine forth; radiate; beam. [Rare.]

Firm as his cause

His bolder heart: . . .

His eyes effulging a peculiar fire.

Thomson, Britannia.

II. intrans. To send forth a flood of light; shine with splendor.

effulgence (e-ful'jens), n. [= Sp. efulgencia, < L. effulgen (t-s), pp. = see effulgent.] A shining forth, as of light; great luster or brightness; splendor: as, the effulgence of divine glory.

So breaks on the traveller, faint and astray,
The bright and the balmy effulgence of morn.

Beattie, The Hermit.

To glow with the effulgence of Christian truth.

Sumner, Hon. John Pickering.

—Syn. Brilliance, luster, etc. See radiance.
effulgent (e-ful'jent), a. [L. effulgen (t-s), pp. of effulgere, shine forth: see effulge.] Shining; bright; splendid; diffusing a flood of light.

The downward sun
Looks out effulgent from amid the flash
Of broken clouds.

Thomson, Spring.

effulgently (e-ful'jent-li), adv. In an effulgent or splendid manner.

effumability (e-fū-mā-bil'i-ti), n. [Effumable: see effumable.] The quality of flying off in fumes of vapor, or of being volatile.

Paracelsus . . . seems to define mercury by volatility, or (if I may coin such a word) effumability.

Boyle, Works, I. 639.

effumable (e-fū'mā-bl), a. [Effume + -able.] Capable of flying off in fumes or vapor; volatile.
effumer (e-fūm'), v. t. [F. effumer, < L. effumare, emit smoke or vapor, < ez, out, + fumare, smoke, steam, < fumus, smoke, vapor: see fume.] To breathe or puff out; emit, as steam or vapor.

I can make this dog take as many whiffs as I list, and he shall retain or effume them, at my pleasure.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, III. 1.

effund (e-fund'), v. t. [L. effundere, pour out: see effuse.] To pour out.

Olyves now that oute of helthes dwelle
Oyldregges salt effunde upon the roote.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 108.

If he his life effund

To utmost death, the high God hath design'd
That we both live.

Dr. H. More, Psychozoia, II. 146.

effuse (e-fūz'), v. t.; pret. and pp. effused, pp. effusing. [L. effusus, pp. of effundere, effundere, pour forth, < ez, forth, + fundere, pour: see fuse.] To pour out, as a fluid; spill; shed.

Smoke of encense effuse in drie oxe dung
Doo under me, to helel hem and socoure.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 138.

Whose maiden blood, thus rigorously effus'd,
Will cry for vengeance at the gates of heaven.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 4.

Why to a man enamour'd,
That at her feet effuses all his soul,
Must woman cold appear, false to herself and him?

Steele, Lying Lover, v. 1.

effuse (e-fūs'), a. [= OF. effus = Sp. effuso = It. effuso, < L. effusus, pp. see the verb.] 1. Poured out freely; profuse.

'Tis pride, or emptiness, applies the straw,
That tickles little minds to mirth effuse.

Young, Night Thoughts, viii.

2. In bot.: (a) Very loosely spreading, as a panicle, etc. (b) In lichenology, spread out without definite form or figure: opposed to effigurate.

—3. In zool.: (a) In conch., applied to shells where the aperture is not whole behind, but the lips are separated by a gap or groove. (b) In entom., loosely joined; composed of parts which are almost separated from one another: opposed to compact or coarctate.

effuse (e-fūs'), n. [Effuse, v.] Effusion; outpouring; loss; waste.

And much effuse of blood doth make me faint.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., II. 6.

effusion (e-fū'zhōn), n. [= F. effusion = Sp. effusion = Pg. effusão = It. effusione, < L. effusio (n.), < effundere, pp. effusus, pour out: see effuse.] 1. The act of pouring out, literally or figuratively; a shedding forth; an outpour: as, the effusion of water, of blood, of grace, of words, etc.

When there was but as yet one only family in the world, no means of instruction, human or divine, could prevent effusion of blood.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, I. 10.

The . . . most pitiful Historie of their Martyrdom, I have often perused not without effusion of tears.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 64.

The effusion of the Spirit under the times of the Gospel: by which we mean those extraordinary gifts and abilities which the Apostles had after the Holy Ghost is said to descend upon them.

Stillington, Sermons, I. ix.

2. That which is poured out; a fluid, or figuratively an influence of any kind, shed abroad.

Wash me with that precious effusion, and I shall be whiter than snow.

Eikon Basilike.

Specifically.—3. An outpour of thought in writing or speech; a literary effort, especially in verse: as, a poetical effusion: commonly used in disparagement.

Two or three of his shorter effusions, indeed, . . . have a spirit that would make them amusing anywhere.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 845.

4. In pathol., the escape of a fluid from the vessels containing it into a cavity, into the surrounding tissues, or on a free surface: as, the effusion of lymph.—5. [ML. effusio (n.), tr. of Gr. effusis.] That part of the constellation Aquarius (which see) included within the stream of water. It contains the star Fomalhaut, now located in the Southern Fish.—Effusion of gases, in chem., the escape of gases through minute apertures into a vacuum. In his experiments to determine the rate of effusion of gases, Graham used thin sheets of metal or glass, perforated with minute apertures (80 millimeter or .003 inch in diameter). The rates of effusion coincided so nearly with the rates of diffusion as to lead to the conclusion that both phenomena follow the same law, and therefore the rates of effusion are inversely as the square roots of the densities of the gases.

effusive (e-fū'siv), a. [L. as if effusivus*, < effundere, pp. effusus, pour out: see effuse.] 1. Pouring out; flowing forth profusely: as, effusive speech.

Th' effusive south

Warms the wide air, and o'er the void of heaven Breathes the big clouds with vernal showers distant.

Thomson, Spring, I. 144.

Hence—2. Making an extravagant or undue exhibition of feeling.

He [Dante] is too sternly touched to be effusive and tearful. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 121.

3. Poured abroad; spread or poured freely.

With thirsty sponge they rub the tables o'er
(The swains unite the toll); the walls, the floor, Wash'd with th' effusive wave, are purg'd of gore. Pope, Odyssey, xxii.

egest (ē-jest'), v. [L. egestus, pp. of egerere, bring out, discharge, void, vomit, < e, out, & gerere, carry.] 1. trans. To discharge or void, as excrement: opposed to ingest.

II. intrans. To defecate; pass dejecta of any kind.

There be divers creatures that sleep all winter, as the bear, . . . the bee, etc. These all wax fat when they sleep, and egest not. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 899.

egesta (ē-jes'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. egestus, pp. of egerere, void, vomit: see egest.] That which is thrown out; specifically, excrementitious matters voided as the refuse of digestion; excrement, feces, or dejecta of any kind: opposed to ingesta.

During this time she vomited everything, the egesta being mixed with bile. Med. News, XLI. 340.

egestion (ē-jes'chōn), n. [L. egestio (-n-), < egerere, pp. egestus, void, vomit: see egest.] That act of voiding the refuse of digestion, or that which is voided; defecation; dejection: opposed to ingestion.

It is confounded with the intestinal excretions and egestions. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 13.

egestive (ē-jes'tiv), a. [Egest + -ive.] Of or for egestion: opposed to ingestive.

egg¹ (eg), n. [ME. egge, pl. egges, eggis (of Scand. origin, < Icel. egg, etc., below), parallel with ME. ey, eye, ay, ai, pl. eyren, eiren, ayren, eren, etc. (this form, which disappeared in the first half of the 16th century, would have given mod. E. ay*, riming with day, etc.), of native origin: namely, < AS. æg, rarely æig (in comp. also ager-), pl. ægru, = D. ei = MLG. ei, eig, LG. ei = OHG. ei, pl. eigr, MHG. ei, G. ei, pl. eier, = Icel. egg = Sw. ägg = Dan. æg = Goth. addjis* (?), Crimean Goth. ada = OIr. ogh, Ir. ugh = Gael. uigh = W. uey = L. ovum, later ovum (< It. ovo = Sp. huevo = Pg. ovo = Pr. ou, uov, ueu = OF. oef, F. œuf) = Gr. ᾠόν, in older forms ᾠον, ᾠεον, dial. ᾠᾱεον, orig. ᾠᾱον* (NGr. avov, also ᾠᾱον) = O. Bulg. jajje (orig. avje*?) = Bulg. jajce = Serv. Pol. jajje = Bohem. vejce = Russ. (dim.) yaitse, an egg. The origin of the word is uncertain; not found in Skt., etc.] 1. The body formed in the females of all animals (with the exception of a few of the lowest type, which are reproduced by gemmation or division), in which, by impregnation, the development of the fetus takes place; an ovum, ovule, or egg-cell; the procreative product of the female, corresponding to the sperm, sperm-cell, or spermatozoon of the male. In biology the term is used in the widest possible sense, synonymously with ovum (which see). In its simplest expression, an egg is a mass or speck of protoplasm capable of producing an organism like the parent, sometimes by itself, often only by impregnation with the corresponding substance of the opposite sex; and in low sexless organisms the generative body is indistinguishable as an egg-cell from a sperm-cell. In higher animals which have opposite sexes the egg is usually distinguished from the spermatozoon by its greater relative size and its sphericity. Regarded morphologically, an egg has throughout the animal kingdom one single and simple character, or morphic valence, that of the cell, in which a cell-wall, cell-substance, a nucleus, and a nucleolus are, as a rule, distinguishable. Such an egg is usually of microscopic or minute size; and, however comparatively enormous an egg may become by the addition of other structures, its morphological character as a cell is not altered. Thus, an egg, in its primitive undifferentiated and unimpregnated condition, does not differ morphologically from any other cell of an animal organism, or from the whole of a single-celled animal, nor can the egg of a sponge, for example, be distinguished from that of a woman. Physiologically, however, the egg differs enormously from other cells, in that under proper conditions it may germinate or build up an entire organism like that of the parent. This is usually possible only after impregnation; but the eggs of parthenogenetic insects, as aphids, germinate for several generations without the male element. The parts of an egg may be named in general terms, the same as those used for other cells; but special names are usually applied. Thus, the nucleolus or smallest and inmost recognizable constituent is called the germinal spot or spot of Wagner; the nucleus is called the germinal vesicle or vesicle of Weismann (in both cases wrong, because these parts are not specially concerned in germination, and may even disappear after impregnation, the germinal vesicle proper being quite another structure). The common cell-substance or protoplasm is the vitellus or yolk; the cell-wall is the vitelline membrane, sometimes called in human anatomy the zona pellucida. To these regular constituents of an egg may be added others, namely: (1) a large, sometimes enormous, mass of granular colored albumen or food-yolk, as distinguished from the proper formative yolk, as that constituting nearly all the ball of yellow of a hen's egg; (2) a great quantity of colorless albumen, the "white" of an egg. Both the white and the "yellow," however large in mass, are included in what corresponds to the original cell-wall. But the latter may acquire with its great increase in size a special thickness and toughness, then becoming (3) the egg-pod, putamen, or membrana putaminis; which may be still further thickened and hardened; (4) the egg-shell, either white or variously pigmented. Thus it is seen that the great size of some eggs, as those of all birds, most reptiles, many batrachians, and some fishes, is due to extraneous substances deposited upon the true egg or egg-cell. This process of inclusion may go still further, the egg, or a mass of eggs together, being enveloped in a glairy substance, egg-glue or oöglæa, as that of frogs' eggs, or encased in variously and often curiously constructed egg-cases. A trace of this is seen in the human egg, where a little granular matter, derived from a Graafian follicle and known as the discus proligerus, surrounds the egg-cell. Eggs the whole of whose yolk is formative, or makes up into the body of the embryo after segmentation of the whole vitellus, are called holoblastic; others, with a quantity of food-yolk which does not undergo segmentation, are meroblastic. All large eggs, as birds', are meroblastic. In these the egg proper is known as the embryo or tread; and the tough, stringy albumen which steadies or buoys the yellow in the white forms the chalazæ. The germ-yolk and the food-yolk may occupy different relative positions. (See centrothelial, ectothelial, etc.) The organ in which an egg is produced, whatever its size, shape, or position in the body of the female, is the ovary; the passage by which it is conveyed to another part of the body, or to the exterior, is an oviduct. In the former all the essential parts of the egg appear; in the latter various accessory structures, as the white and the shell, are deposited. All sexed animals "lay" eggs; those in which the egg passes directly out of the body, to be hatched outside, are called oviparous; those in which the egg severs its vascular or vital connection with the parent, but remains inside the body to hatch, are ovomivorous; those whose eggs retain vascular connection with the parent, as by means of a placenta and an umbilical cord, so that they bring forth alive, are viviparous. In the last the oviducts are more or less modified, as into Fallopian tubes, uterus, and vagina, for the purpose of gestation, as distinguished from the incubation of eggs laid outside the body. Egg-laying, as of birds, reptiles, insects, etc., is called oviposition; many insects have the end of the abdomen modified into a special ovipositor. The normal and usual shape of an egg is the sphere, preserved even in some large eggs, as those of turtles; many eggs are cylindrical, with rounded ends; the largest eggs, with a hard chalky shell, as birds', present a characteristic figure, the ovoid, varying to more or less conical, or elliptical, or subspherical. In such cases the large end is called the butt, the small end the point. All mammalian eggs, excepting those of the oviparous monotremes, are spherical and microscopic; the egg of the human female measures about $\frac{1}{16}$ of an inch in diameter. A hen's egg of good size weighs about 1,000 grains, of which the white is 600, the yolk 300, the shell 100. An ostrich's egg holds about 3 pints. The largest known egg is that of the extinct Madagascan elephant-bird, Aepyornis maximus, having a capacity of about 12 dozen hens' eggs, and a long axis of a foot or more. Eggs of many animals besides birds are important food-products, of great economic and commercial value, as turtles' eggs, the roe of many fishes, the coral or berry of lobsters, etc.

He eet many sondry metes, mortwrewe, and puddynges,
Wombe-cloutes and wyldie braune & egges fyryed with grece, Piers Plowman (B), xiii. 63.

This bird be a bank bilidh his nest,
And helpeth his eiren and heith hem after.
Richard the Redeless, III. 42.
The largest Eggs, yet warm within their Nest,
Together with the Hens which laid 'em, drest.
Congreve, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, xi.

2. Something like or likened to an egg in shape.

There was taken a great glass bubble with a long neck, such as chymists are wont to call a philosophical egg. Boyle.

[The egg was used by the early Christians as a symbol of the hope of the resurrection. The use of eggs at Easter has, doubtless, reference to the same idea. Eggs of marble have been found in the tombs of early Christians.—Allen egg. See alien.—Ants' eggs. See antl.—Bad egg, a bad or worthless person. [Collog.]—Coronate eggs, costate eggs. The motive is of Hellenic origin, but has been a usual one from Hellenic times to the present day, though it has not preserved its Greek refinement.—Egg of the universe, in ancient Greek cosmogony, the sphere of the sky with its contents, segmented at the surface of the earth, and supposed to be an egg in process of incubation.—Egg Saturday, or Feast of Eggs (Festum Ovorum), the day before Quinquagesima Sunday.

By the common people too, the preceding Saturday [that preceding "the Sunday before the first in Lent"], in Oxfordshire particularly, is called Egg Saturday.

Hampson, Medii Aevi Kalendarium, I. 158.

Electric egg, a form of electrical apparatus used to illustrate the influence of the pressure of the air upon the electrical discharge. It consists of an elliptical glass vessel with brass rods inserted at the ends. When it is exhausted of air, and a discharge of high-potential electricity is passed between these poles, a continuous violet tuft of light connects them, the form of which varies with the degree of exhaustion.—Ephippial egg. See ephippial.—Mohr's egg, the bezoar-stone of the mohr, an antelope.—Roc's egg. See roc.—To come in with five eggs, to make a foolish remark or suggestion.

Whiles another gyreth counsell to make peace wyth the Kynde of Arragone, . . . another cummeth in wyth hys v. eggs, and aduyseth to howke in the Kynde of Castell.
Sir T. More, Utopia, tr. by Robinson (ed. 1651), sig. E, vi.

To put all one's eggs into one basket, to venture all one has in one speculation or investment.—To take eggs for money, to allow one's self to be imposed upon: a saying which originated at a time when eggs were so plentiful as scarcely to have a money value.

Leon. Mine honest friend,
Will you take eggs for money?
Mam. No, my lord, I'll fight.

Shak., W. T., i. 2.

O rogue, rogue, I shall have eggs for my money; I must hang myself.

Rouley, Match at Midnight.

egg¹ (eg), v. t. [< egg¹, n.]. 1. To apply eggs to; cover or mix with eggs, as cutlets, fish, bread, etc., in cooking.—2. To pelt with eggs. [U. S.]

The abolition editor of the "Newport (Ky.) News" was caged out of Alexandria, Campbell County, in that State, on Monday.
Baltimore Sun, Aug. 1, 1857.

egg² (eg), v. t. [< ME. eggen, incite, urge on, instigate (in either good or bad sense), < Icel. egg = Sw. egga, upp-egga = Dan. egge, op-egge, incite, egg, lit. 'edge,' < Icel. egg = Sw. egg = Dan. egg = AS. egg, E. edge: see edge, n., and edge, v., a doublet of egg²]. To incite or urge; encourage; instigate; provoke: now nearly always with on.

Adam and Eve he egged to don ille, Consalide Cayne to cullen has brother.

Piers Plowman (C), iii. 61.

Some vpon no iust & lawfull grounds (being egged on by ambition, enuie, and couetise) are induced to follow the armie.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 552.

Thou shouldst be prancing of thy steed,
To egg thy soldiers forward in thy wars.

Greene, Alphonsus, III.

egg-albumin (eg'al-bū'min), n. The albumin which occurs in the white of eggs. It is closely allied to serum-albumin, but differs in certain physical properties.

egg-animal (eg'an'i-mal), n. One of the Ovularia.

egg-apple (eg'ap'l), n. Same as egg-plant.

eggar, n. See eggers.

egg-bag (eg'bag), n. 1. The ovary.—2. A bag used by conjurers, from which eggs seem to be taken though it is empty.

egg-bald (eg'bald), a. Bald as an egg; completely bald. Tennyson.

egg-basket (eg'bās'ket), n. An open wire basket for use in boiling eggs, by means of which the eggs may all be taken up at once, and the water drained off of them.

egg-beater (eg'bē'ter), n. An instrument having a piece to be twirled by the hand, for use in whipping eggs.

egg-bird (eg'bērd), n. 1. A popular name of the sooty tern, Sterna (Haliplana) fuliginosa, whose eggs, like those of some other terns, have commercial value in the West Indies and southern United States.—2. A name of sundry other sea-birds, as murres, guillemots, etc., which nest in large communities, and whose eggs are of economic or commercial value.

egg-blower (eg'blō'er), n. A blowpipe used by oölogists in emptying eggs of their contents by forcing in a stream of air or water with the breath through a hole in the shell made with the egg-drill. They are of various styles and sizes, generally curved or hooked at the small end like a chemist's blowpipe, but smaller and finer at the point.

egg-born (eg'börn), a. Produced from an egg, as all animals are; but specifically, hatched from the egg of an oviparous animal.

egg-carrier (eg'kar'i-ēr), n. A device for transporting eggs without injury. (a) A box or frame with pockets or partitions of cloth, wire, cardboard, etc., for holding each a single egg of poultry. (b) In fish-culture, an apparatus for carrying ova in water to be subsequently hatched.

egg-case (eg'kās), n. A natural casing or envelop of some kinds of eggs. (c) The oötheca or case in which the eggs of various insects, as the cockroach, are contained when laid. (d) The silken case in which many spiders inclose their eggs; an egg-pouch. (e) The case in which the eggs of sharks and other elasmobranchs are contained; a sea-barrow. (f) The oöcapsule of various marine carnivorous gastropods, especially of the families Buccinidae, Muricidae, etc. See oöcapsule.

egg-cell (eg'sel), n. An ovum; an ovule; an egg itself, when it is in the cell stage, or state of a cell, as a nucleated mass of protoplasm, with or without a nucleolus, and with or without a cell-wall, but ordinarily possessing both. See ovum.

egg-cleavage (eg'klē'vāj), n. The segmentation of the vitellus of an egg; cell-cleavage of an egg-cell; the germination of an ovum, ovule, or egg from the stage of a cytula to that of a morula. It is one of the earliest processes of germination, in which the single mass of the formative yolk is divided into a great number of other masses or cells, by subsequent differentiation of which the whole body of the embryo is formed. Egg-cleavage proceeds in various "rhythms" or ratios, as 2, 4, 8, 16, etc.—Discoidal egg-cleavage. See discoidal.

egg-cockle (eg'kok'l), n. An edible cockle, Cardium edatum.

egg-cup (eg'kup), n. A cup for use in eating soft-boiled eggs. In its original form, it is made to hold a single egg upright while this is eaten out of the shell with a spoon. Another form is double, with one end like the former, and the reverse end larger for eggs to be broken into it.

egg-dance (eg'dāns), n. A dance by a single performer, who is required to execute a complicated figure, blindfolded, among a number of eggs, without touching them.

Preparations in the middle of the road for the egg-dance, so strikingly described by Goethe.

Hone, Year Book, p. 962.

egg-drill (eg'dril), n. An instrument for drilling or boring a small round hole in the shell of a bird's egg, used by oölogists. It consists of a little steel or iron bar which may be twirled in the fingers, having a sharp-pointed conical head roughened to a rasping surface.

egget, n. and v. An obsolete form of edge.

eggement, n. See eggment.

egg-ended (eg'en'ded), a. Terminated by ovoidal caps or ends.

Spherical shells, such as the ends of egg-ended cylindrical boilers.

egger¹ (eg'er), n. [< egg¹ + -er]. Also called eggler, where the l appears to be merely intrusive.] One who makes a business of collecting eggs, as of birds or turtles.

egger² (eg'er), n. [< egg², v., + -er]. One who eggs, urges, or incites: usually with on.

egger³ (eg'er), n. [Also written eggar; origin uncertain.] In entom., a reddish-brown moth of either of the genera Lasiocampa and Eriogaster: as, the oak-egger, L. quercus; the grass-egger, L. trifolii; the small egger, E. lacustris.

egger-moth (eg'er-mōth), n. Same as egger³.

eggery (eg'er-i), n.; pl. eggeries (-iz). [< egg¹ + -ery]. A nest of eggs; a place where eggs are laid. [Rare.]

egg-fish (eg'fish), n. One of many names applied to gymnodont plectognath fishes, from their shape when inflated. They are chiefly of the family Tetradontidae.

egg-flip (eg'flip'), n. A hot drink made of ale or beer with eggs, sugar, spice, and sometimes a little spirit, thoroughly beaten together. It is popularly called a yard of flannel, from its fleecy appearance.

The revolution itself was born in the room of the Caucus Club, amidst clouds of smoke and deep potations of egg-flip.
Nineteenth Century, XXIII. 98.

egg-forceps (eg'fôr'seps), n. sing. and pl. 1. An instrument used in fish-culture in handling or removing ova. Also called egg-tongs.—2. A delicate spring-forceps used by oölogists to pick out pieces of the embryo or membrane from eggs prepared for the cabinet.

egg-glass (eg'glās), n. 1. A sand-glass running about three minutes, for timing the boiling of eggs.—2. An egg-cup of glass.

egg-glue (eg'glō), n. A tough, viscid, gelatinous substance in which the eggs of some animals, as crustaceans, are enveloped, serving to attach them to the body of the parent; oöglōa.

egg-hot (eg'hot), n. A posset made of eggs, ale, sugar, and brandy. Lamb.

egging (eg'ing), n. The act or art of collecting eggs, as for oölogical or commercial purposes; the business of an egger.

egg-laying (eg'lā'ing), a. Oviparous; laying eggs to be hatched outside the body.

eggler (eg'lēr), n. See egger¹.

egg-lighter (eg'li'ter), n. Same as egg-tester.

egg-membrane (eg'mem'brān), n. The cell-wall of an ovum; the vitelline membrane; in ornith., the egg-pod.

eggment (eg'ment), n. [ME. eggement; < egg² + -ment.] Incitement; instigation.

Thurgh womannes eggement Mankind was lorn, and damned ay to die.
Chaucer, Man of Law's Tale, l. 744.

egg-nog (eg'nog'), n. A sweet, rich, and stimulating cold drink made of eggs, milk, sugar, and spirits. The yolks of the eggs are thoroughly mixed with the sugar (a tablespoonful for each egg), and half a pint of spirits is added for each dozen of eggs. Lastly, half a pint of milk for each egg is stirred in. The whites of the eggs are used to make a froth.

egg-pie (eg'pī'), n. A pie made of eggs. Halliwell.

egg-plant (eg'plant), n. The brinjal or aubergine, Solanum Melongena, cultivated for its large oblong or ovate fruit, which is of a dark-purple color, or sometimes white or yellow. The fruit is highly esteemed as a vegetable. Also called egg-apple, mad-apple.

Flowering Branch and Fruit of Egg-plant (Solanum Melongena).

egg-pod (eg'-pod), n. A pod or case enveloping and containing an egg or eggs; specifically, in ornith., the membrana putaminis, the tough membrane which lines the shell of a bird's egg. See putamen.

egg-pop (eg'pop'), n. A kind of egg-nog. [New Eng.]

Lewis temporarily contended with the stronger fascinations of egg-pop.
Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 59.

No more egg-pop, made with eggs that would have been fighting cocks, to judge by the pugnacity the beverage containing their yolks developed. O. W. Holmes, Essays, p. 146.

egg-pouch (eg'pouch), n. A sac of silk or other material in which certain spiders and insects carry their eggs; the oötheca.

eggs-and-bacon (egz'and-bā'kn), n. [So called from the two shades of yellow in the flowers.] 1. The bird's-foot trefoil, Lotus corniculatus.—2. The toad-flax, Linaria vulgaris.

eggs-and-collops (eggz'and-kol'aps), n. Same as eggs-and-bacon.

egg-sauce (eg'sās), n. Sauce prepared with eggs, used with boiled fish, fowls, etc.

egg-shaped (eg'shāpt), a. Ovoid; having the figure of a solid whose cross-section anywhere is circular, and whose long section is oval (deeper near one end than near the other). An egg-shaped egg is technically distinguished in oölogy from an elliptical, pyriform, or subspherical egg.

egg-shell (eg'shel), n. The shell or outside covering of an egg: chiefly said of the hard, brittle, calcareous covering of birds' eggs. This shell consists mostly of carbonate of lime or chalk, deposited upon and in among the fibers of the egg-pod or putamen. It is a secretion of a particular calcific tract of the oviduct near the end of that tube. It may be nearly colorless and of such crystalline purity and translucency that the contents of the fresh egg show a pinkish bluish through it, or very heavy, opaque, flaky white; whole-colored of various tones, as green, blue, drab, ochrey, etc.; or partly-colored in many shades of reds, browns, etc., in endless variety of patterns. Besides the evident diversity of character in thickness, roughness, etc., the shell has many variations in microscopic texture, depending upon details of the deposition of the particles of lime in the pod. The shell of an ostrich's egg is so thick and hard that it may seriously wound a man if the egg explodes, as it sometimes does when added, in consequence of the compression of the gases generated in decomposition.—Egg-shell china, egg-shell porcelain, porcelain of extreme thinness and translucency. It was made originally in China, and is now produced also in European factories, where the process consists in filling a mold of plaster of Paris with the material called barbotine, of which a thin film at once adheres to the mold from the absorption of its moisture by the gypsum. The liquid barbotine being then thrown out and the mold put into the kiln, the film remaining in it is baked, and can then be removed from the mold.

egg-slice (eg'slīs), n. A kitchen utensil for removing omelets or fried eggs from a pan.

egg-spoon (eg'spōn), n. A small spoon for eating eggs from the shell.

egg-syringe (eg'sir'inj), n. A small, light metal syringe for forcing a stream of water into an egg to empty it, or to wash the inside of the shell, for oölogical purposes. The best are made with a ring in the end of the piston large enough to insert the thumb, so that they can be worked with one hand while the other holds the egg. The nozzle is fine, and may be variously curved.

egg-tester (eg'tes'tēr), n. A device for examining eggs by transmitted light to test their age and condition or the advancement of an embryonic chick. It may be in the form of a dark lantern with an opening through which the egg is viewed, or of a box with perforated lid carrying the eggs, and a reflector below for throwing the light through them, or in the much simpler and more practical form of a conical tube, the egg being held toward the light against the orifice at the larger end and observed by means of an eye-hole in the smaller end. Also egg-lighter.

egg-timer (eg'ti'mēr), n. A sand-glass used for determining the time in boiling eggs.

egg-tongs (eg'tōngz), n. sing. and pl. Same as egg-forceps.

egg-tooth (eg'tōth), n. A hard point or process on the beak or snout of the embryo of an oviparous animal, as a bird or reptile, by means of which the rupture or breakage of the egg-shell may be facilitated.

The embryos [of serpents] are provided with an egg-tooth, a special development like that of the chick. Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 352.

egg-trot (eg'trot), n. In the manège, a cautious jog-trot pace, like that of a housewife riding to market with eggs in her panniers. Also called eggwife-trot.

egg-tube (eg'tüb), n. In zoöl., a tubular organ in which ova are developed, or through which they are conveyed to or toward the exterior of the body; an oviduct.

The ovaries [in Lepidoptera] consist on either side of four very long many-chambered egg-tubes, which contain a great quantity of eggs. Claus, Zoology (trans.), p. 581.

egg-urchin (eg'er'chin), n. A globular sea-urchin; one of the echini proper, or regular sea-urchins, as distinguished from the flat ones known as cake-urchins, or the cordate ones called heart-urchins.

eggwife (eg'wif), n. A woman who sells eggs. — Eggwife-trot. Same as egg-trot.

eghet, n. An obsolete variant of eye. Chaucer.

egidos, n. pl. [Sp.] See ejido.

egilopic, egilopical, etc. See ægilopic, etc.

egis, n. See ægis.

eglandular (ē-glan'dū-lār), a. [L. e- priv. + glandula, gland: see glandular.] In biol., having no glands.

eglandulose, eglandulous (ē-glan'dū-lōs, -lus), a. [L. e- priv. + glandula, gland: see glandulose.] Same as eglandular.

eglantine (eg'lan-tin or -tīn), n. [Early mod. E. also eglentine; first in the 16th century, < F. eglantine, aglantine*, now eglantine (= Pr. aglantina), eglantine (cf. OF. aglantin, adj. pertaining to the eglantine); with suffix -ine (E. -ine, L. -inus, fem. -ina), < OF. aglant, aglant, aglant = Pr. agulen, sweetbrier, hip-tree, < L. aculeatus, an assumed form, lit. prickly, thorny, < aculeus, a sting, prickle, thorn, < acus, a point, needle: see aculeus, and cf. aglet.] 1. The sweetbrier, Rosa rubiginosa. It flowers in June and July, and grows in dry, bushy places.

When the lilly leafe, and the eglantine,
Doth bud and spring with a merry cheere.
The Noble Fisherman (Child's Ballads, V. 329).
Sweet is the eglantine, but pricketh nere.
Spenser, Sonnets, xxvi.

The leaf of eglantine, whom not to slander, Outsweeten'd not thy breath.

Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2.

2. The wild rose or dogrose, Rosa canina.

Eglantine, cynorrodos. Levins, Manip. Vocab. (1570).

To hear the lark begin his flight,
And at my window bid good morrow
Through the sweet-briar or the vine
Or the twisted eglantine.

Milton, L'Allegro, l. 48.

Eglantine has sometimes been erroneously taken for the honeysuckle, and it seems more than probable that Milton so understood it, by his calling it "twisted." If not, he must have meant the wildrose. Nares.

eglateret, n. [ME., also eglientier (the form egletiere in Tennyson being a spurious mod. archaism); = MD. eghelentier, < OF. eglientier, eglienter, aglantier, aglantier, esglantier (cf. Pr. aglantier), the eglantine, prop. the bush or tree as distinguished from the flower; with suffix -er (E. -er, L. -arius), < aglant, aglant, aglant, the eglantine: see eglantine.] The sweetbrier; eglantine.

He was lad into a garden of Cayphas, and there he was cround with eglienter. Mandeville, Travels, p. 14.

The woodbine and egletiere
Drip sweeter dews than traitor's tear.

Tennyson, A Dirge.

eglintinet, n. An obsolete spelling of eglantine. Minsheu.

egglomeratē (ē-glom'er-āt), v. t. i. pret. and pp. egglomerated, pp. egglomerating. [L. e, out, + glomeratus, pp. of glomerare, wind up into a ball: see glomerate.] To unwind, as a thread from a ball. Coles, 1717.

egma (eg'mā), n. A humorous corruption of enigma.

Arm. Some enigma, some riddle: come, thy l'envoy; begin.

Cost. No egma, no riddle, no l'envoy.

ego (ē'gō), n. [L. ego = Gr. ἐγώ = AS. ic, E. I: see 12.] The "I"; the feeling, facts, acts, and thinks; any person's "self," considered as essentially the same in all persons. This use of the word was introduced by Descartes, and has long been current in general literature.

The ego, as the subject of thought and knowledge, is now commonly styled by philosophers simply the subject, and subjective is a familiar expression for what pertains to the mind or thinking power. In contrast and correlation to these, the terms object and objective are now in use to denote the non-ego, its affections and properties, and, in general, the really existent as opposed to the ideally known. Sir W. Hamilton.

For the ego without the non-ego is impossible in fact and meaningless in thought, and the abstraction of the ego from the bodily organization and the intuition of itself by itself as a non-bodily entity is an artificial and deceptive process. Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 55.

Absolute ego. See absolute.—The empirical ego, the self as the object of itself: what "I" am conscious of as "myself."—The pure ego, the self regarded abstractly as the mere thinking subject, apart from every object of thought, even itself.

ego-altruistic (ē'gō-al-trū-is'tik), a. Relating or pertaining to one's self and to others. See the extract.

From the egotistic sentiments we pass now to the ego-altruistic sentiments. By this name I mean sentiments which, while implying self-gratification, also imply gratification in others; the representation of this gratification in others being a source of pleasure not intrinsically, but because of ulterior benefits to self which experience associates with it. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 519.

egoical (ē'gō-i-kāl), a. [L. ego + -ic-al.] Pertaining to egotism. Hare. [Rare.]

egotism (ē'gō-izm), n. [= D. G. egotismus = Dan. egoisme = Sw. egoism = F. égoïsme = Sp. Pg. It. egoismo; as ego + -ism.] 1. The habit of valuing everything only in reference to one's personal interest; pure selfishness or exclusive reference to self as an element of character.

The Ideal, the True and Noble that was in them having faded out, and nothing now remaining but naked egotism, vulturous greediness, they cannot live. Carlyle.

2. In ethics, the doing or seeking of that which affords pleasure or advantage to one's self, in distinction to that which affords pleasure or advantage to others: opposed to altruism. In this sense the term does not necessarily imply anything reprehensible, and is not synonymous with egotism.

Egotism is the feeling which demands for self an increase of enjoyment and diminution of discomfort. Altruism is that which demands these results for others.

L. F. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., I. 14.

Egotism comprises the sum of inclinations that aim at purely personal gratification, each of these inclinations having its particular gratification; and the further we go back in civilisation, the greater is the predominance which these egoistic impulses have.

Maudsley, Body and Will, p. 164.

3. In metaph., the opinion that no matter exists and only one mind, that of the individual holding the opinion. The term is also applied (by critics) to forms of subjective idealism supposed logically to result in such an opinion. See solipsism. = Syn. 1. Pride, Egotism, etc. See egotism.

egoist (ē'gō-ist), n. [= D. G. Dan. Sw. egoist = F. égoïste = Sp. Pg. It. egoista; as ego + -ist.] 1. One who is characterized by egotism; a selfish or self-centered person.—2. In metaph., one holding the doctrine of egotism.

egoistic, egoistical (ē'gō-is'tik, -tī-kāl), a. [L. egoist + -ic, -ical.] 1. Characterized by the vice of egotism; absorbed in self.—2. In ethics, pertaining or relating to one's self, and not to others; relating to the promotion of one's own well-being, or the gratification of one's own desires; characterized by egotism: opposed to altruistic.

The adequately egoistic individual retains those powers which make altruistic activities possible.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 72.

3. In metaph., involving the doctrine that nothing exists but the ego.

The egoistical idealism of Fichte is less exposed to criticism than the theological idealism of Berkeley.

Sir W. Hamilton.

Egoistical object, a mode of consciousness regarded as an object.—Egoistical representationism, the doctrine that the external world is known to us by means of representative ideas, and that these are modifications of consciousness.

egoistically (ē'gō-is'tī-kāl-i), adv. In an egoistic manner; as regards one's self.

Each profits egoistically from the growth of an altruism which leads each to aid in preventing or diminishing others' violence. H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 77.

egotity (ē'gō'tī-ti), n. [L. ego + -ity.] The essential element of the ego or self; egohood.

This innocent imposture, which I have all along taken care to carry on, as it then was of some use, has since been of regular service to me, and, by being mentioned in one of my papers, effectually recovered my egotity out of the hands of some gentlemen who endeavoured to correct it for me. Swift, On Harrison's Tatler, No. 28.

If you would permit me to use a school term, I would say the egoty remains: that is, that by which I am the same I was. W. Wollaston, Religion of Nature, ix. § 8.

The non-ego out of which we arise must somehow have an egoty in it as cause of finite egos. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 546.

egoize (ē'gō-iz), v. i. pret. and pp. egoized, pp. egoizing. [L. ego + -ize.] To give excessive attention or consideration to one's self, or to what relates to one's self; be absorbed in self. [Rare.]

egophonic, egophony. See ægophonic, ægophony.

egotheism (ē'gō-thē-izm), n. [L. ego + θεός, God, + E. -ism.] The deification of self; the substitution of self for the Deity; also, the opinion that the individual self is essentially divine.

egotism (ē'gō-tizm or eg'ō-tizm), n. [L. ego + t (see egotist) + -ism.] 1. The practice of putting forward or dwelling upon one's self; the habit of talking or writing too much about one's self.

Adieu to egotism; I am sick to death at the very name of self. Shelley, in Dowden, I. 101.

It is idle to criticise the egotism of autobiographies, however pervading and intense. W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 1st ser., p. 177.

Hence—2. An excessive esteem or consideration for one's self, leading one to judge of everything by its relation to one's own interests or importance.

The most violent egotism which I have met with . . . is that of Cardinal Wolsey, "Ego et rex meus, I and my King." Spectator, No. 562.

There can be no doubt that this remarkable man owed the vast influence which he exercised over his contemporaries at least as much to his gloomy egotism as to the real power of his poetry. Macaulay, Moore's Byron.

Selfishness is only active egotism.

Lovell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 364.

= Syn. Pride, Egotism, Vanity, Conceit, Self-consciousness. Pride and egotism imply a certain indifference to the opinions of others concerning one's self. Pride is a self-contained satisfaction with the excellence of what one is or has, despising what others are or think. Vanity is just the opposite; it is the love of being even fulsomely admired. Pride rests often upon higher or intrinsic things; as, pride of family, place, or power; intellectual or spiritual pride. Vanity rests often upon lower and external things, as beauty, figure, dress, ornaments; but the essential difference is in the question of dependence upon others. Over the same things one person might have pride and another vanity. One may be too proud to be vain. Conceit, or self-conceit, is an overestimate of one's own abilities or accomplishments; it is too much an elevation of the real self to rest upon wealth, dress, or other external things. Egotism is a strong and obtrusive confidence in one's self, shown primarily in conversation, not only by frequent references to self, but by monopolizing attention, ignoring the opinions of others, etc. It differs from conceit chiefly in its selfishness and unconsciousness of its appearance in the eyes of others. Conceit becomes egotism when it is selfish enough to disparage others for its own comparative elevation. Self-consciousness is often confounded with egotism, conceit, or vanity, but it may be only an embarrassing sense of one's own personality, an inability to refrain from thinking how one appears to others; it therefore often makes one shrink out of notice.

Vanity makes men ridiculous, pride odious. — Steele.
Pride, indeed, pervaded the whole man, was written in the harsh, rigid lines of his face, was marked by the way in which he stood, and, above all, in which he bowed.

Macaulay, William Pitt.
His excessive egotism, which filled all objects with himself.

We never could very clearly understand how it is that egotism, so unpopular in conversation, should be so popular in writing.

Macaulay, Moore's Byron.
These sparks with awkward vanity display
What the fine gentleman wore yesterday.

Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 329.
Conceit may puff a man up, but never prop him up.

Ruskin, True and Beautiful.
They that have the least reason have the most self-conceit.

Whitcomb.
Something which befalls you may seem a great misfortune; — you . . . begin to think that it is a chastisement, or a warning. . . . But give up this egotistic indulgence of your fancy; examine a little what misfortunes, greater a thousand fold, are happening, every second, to twenty times worthier persons; and your self-consciousness will change into pity and humility.

Ruskin, Ethics of the Dust, v. egotist (ē-gō-tist or eg'ō-tist), n. [ego + t (inserted to avoid hiatus, or after the analogy of dramatist, epigrammatist, etc.) + -ist. Cf. egotist, egoism, etc.] One who is characterized by egotism, in either sense of that word.

We are all egotists in sickness and debility.

O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 23.
egotistic, egotistical (ē-gō- or eg'ō-tis'tik, ē-gō- or eg'ō-tis'ti-kāl), a. Pertaining to or of the nature of egotism; characterized by egotism: as, an egotistic remark; an egotistic person.

It would, indeed, be scarcely safe to draw any decided inferences as to the character of a writer from passages directly egotistical.

Macaulay.

See II., 2.—Egyptian architecture, the architecture of ancient Egypt, which, among its peculiar monuments, exhibits pyramids, rock-temples and tombs, and gigantic monolithic obelisks.

The characteristic features of the style are solidity and the majesty attending colossal size. Among its peculiarities are: (a) The gradual converging or sloping inward of most of its exterior wall-surfaces. This is especially noticeable in the pylons or monumental gateways standing singly or in series before its temples. (b) Roofs and covered ways, flat, and composed of immense blocks of stone, reaching from one wall or stone epistyle beam to another, the arch, although in all its forms of frequent use in drains and similar works, not being employed in architecture above ground, which holds consistently to the system of lintel-construction. (c) Columns, numerous, close, and massive, without bases, or with broad, flat, low bases, and exhibiting great variety in their capitals, from a simple square block to a wide-spreading bell, elaborately carved with palm-leaves or other forms suggested by vegetation, especially in some adaptation of the lotus plant, bud, or flower. (d) The employment of a large concave molding to crown the entablature, decorated with vertical flutings or leaves. (e) Walls and columns decorated with a profusion of sculptures in incised outline, often of admirable precision (see cavo-rilievo), or in low relief, representing divinities, men, and animals, with innumerable hieroglyphics, brilliant and true, though simple, coloring being superadded. A remarkable feature of Egyptian architecture is the grandeur of its mechanical operations, as in cutting, polishing, sculpturing, and transporting enormous blocks of limestone and of granite, and in its stupendous excavations in the solid rock. The prototype of the Greek Doric order is to be sought in such Egyptian columnar structures as the grotto-façades of Beni-Hassan; and from the Egyptian lotus carvings and decoration were developed many characteristic Assyrian decorative motives, as well as the Ionic capital and the graceful anthemion-molding of Greece. See mastaba, obelisk, pylon, pyramid, sphinx, etc.—Egyptian art, the architecture, sculpture, and painting of ancient Egypt, one of the most important of the great artistic developments of the world. (See Egyptian architecture, above.) The earliest known

Egyptian sculptures, not less than 6,000 years old, exhibit great technical skill, approach nature with remarkable ease and certainty, and far surpass in naturalness the more conventional works which succeeded them. Yet the best Egyptian works of all times possess striking individuality as well as refinement, a very large proportion of the vast number of portrait statues and reliefs being evidently likenesses, and the physical differences of class, station, and employment, as well as ethnological differences in the countless historical scenes, being clearly rendered. With the advent of the Ptolemies, Greek influences were brought to bear upon Egyptian art, which progressively lost its good qualities without acquiring those of the art of Greece and of Rome. The great Sphinx of Ghizeh is the oldest as well as the largest work of sculpture known; the colossi of Amenhotep (Amenhotep) III. at Thebes (one of them is the famous Memnon, so called) are about 52 feet high; those of the Ramesseum are of the same height; and that of Tanis is nearly 60 feet high. Egyptian painting is strictly illumination, as the colors are laid on flat, without shading or gradation, within a definite outline. The drawing is typically of great beauty, the outlines being firm, accurate, and graceful. In gem-cutting and jewelry, in enamel, in terra-cotta and glass, and in the carving of wood and ivory, in metal-working, and in the industrial arts generally, Egyptian artists and artisans displayed great taste and skill, and were enabled by the diffusion of material prosperity to devise and perfect their products in endless diversity. — Egyptian bean. See bean. — Egyptian black ware, a name given by Wedgwood to one of his varieties of fine earthenware: same as basalt ware (which see, under basalt). — Egyptian blue. See blue. — Egyptian chlorosis. See chlorosis. — Egyptian cloth. Same as mummy-cloth. — Egyptian darkness, deep or total darkness: in allusion to the ninth plague of Egypt (Ex. x. 21–23). — Egyptian frog, a toad. Haliotis. The material seems to have been sand held together by a relatively small amount of potter's clay; this, when fired, turns to an opaque glass or enamel throughout its whole mass. The color is an oxid of copper, which is applied to the surface, and stains the ware very deeply. — Egyptian vulture. See vulture. — Egyptian ware, a variety of Wedgwood ware.

II. n. 1. A native of Egypt; a member of any of the different races constituting the permanent population of Egypt; more specifically, a member or a descendant of the ancient Egyptian race or races, supposed to be now represented chiefly by the Copts and the fellahs or peasantry, as distinguished from the Arabs and other later settlers. — 2. A gipsy.

eider (i'dēr), n. [= D. eider (-vogel) (= E. fowl) = G. eider (-gans) (= E. goose), the eider, < Icel. æðr (æ pron. like E. i) = Sw. eider = Dan. eider (-fugl) (= E. fowl).] 1. Same as eider-duck. — 2. Same as eider-down.

eider-down (i'dēr-dūn), n. [< eider + down, after Icel. æðhar-dūn = Sw. eiderdun = Dan. eiderdun; cf. G. eiderdunen, D. eiderdons, F. éderdon.] Down or soft feathers of the eider-duck, such as the bird plucks from its breast to line the nest or cover the eggs. The commercial down is chiefly obtained from the common eider, and is used in the manufacture of many beautiful fabrics, as coverlets, robes, tipsets, muffs, etc. It is one of the very poorest conductors of heat, as well as an extremely light substance, thus preserving great warmth with very little weight.

eider-duck (i'dēr-duk), n. A duck of the subfamily Fuliginæ and genus Somateria; especially, the common Somateria mollissima, which inhabits both coasts of the North Atlantic. It is much larger than the common duck, being about 2 feet long, and has a peculiarly gibbous bill with a pair of frontal processes. The male is almost entirely black and white in large masses, with the head tinged with green; the female is brown, variegated with gray, and redder, and dusker shades in small patterns. The down with which these birds line their nests is copious, and is much valued for its extreme lightness, warmth, and elasticity. The birds are practically domesticated in some places. The American bird, a slightly different variety from the European, is known as variety dresseri; it breeds abundantly in Labrador, Newfoundland, etc. The king eider-duck is a very distinct species, Somateria (Erionetta) spectabilis, the gibbosity of the bill being different in shape, and the head tinged with blue as well as green. The Pacific eider-duck is S. v-nigrum, having a black V-shaped mark on the chin, but otherwise resembling the common eider. The spectacled eider-duck, Somateria (Arctonetta) fischeri, inhabits the northern Pacific; its bill is not gibbous, and it has no frontal processes, the feathers reaching beyond the nostrils. Steller's duck, Henicometta stelleri, is often called Steller's eider, and sometimes included in the genus Somateria. See Sonateria.

The eider-duck, which swarmed on Farnes island when St. Cuthbert went to lead a lonely life there, became a great favourite with the holy man, . . . and St. Cuthbert's birds are they called to this day.

eisteddfod (i-steŋ'vōd), n.; pl. eisteddfodau (i-steŋ'vōd'ā). [W., a sitting, a session, assembly, esp. congress of bards or literati, < eistedd, sitting (as a verb, sit, be seated), + mod, a circle, inclosure.] An assembly; a meeting; specifically applied to a national assembly or congress of bards and minstrels held periodically in Wales. The eisteddfod is a very ancient institution, but its modern form dates from about the twelfth century. It is designed to foster patriotism, to encourage the study of the Welsh language and literature, and to promote the cultivation of the ancient bardic poetry and music of the principality. Since 1819 an eisteddfod has been held almost every year. It usually attracts thousands of persons from all parts of the country, and lasts three or four days, which are devoted to orations and contests in poetry, singing, harping, etc.; and prizes are awarded, amid much enthusiasm and ceremony, to the successful competitors. The proceedings are conducted partly in Welsh and partly in English. Similar meetings are sometimes held in the United States by citizens of Welsh origin.

eis-wool (is'wūl), n. A fine kind of worsted used for making shawls. Dict. of Needlework.

either (ē'thēr or i'thēr: see below), a. and pron. [< ME. either, eyther, ayther, ayther, ayther, ayther, also cyder, ayder, etc. (also contr. to er, as either to or), adj., pron. indef. and conj., < AS. æghther, contr. of æghwæther (= OFries. eider, aider, orig. = OHG. ēogahwedar*, ēogahwedar, ēogahwedar, ēogahwedar, MHG. iegweder, MG. igwedir, igwedder), either, each, contr. of the orig. ā-gē-hwæther*, < ā, ever, in comp. an indef. prefix equiv. to mod. E. ever, + ge, generalizing prefix, + hwæther, pron, whether: see whether, pron. The forms interchange in ME., in both the pronominal and conjunctive use, with ME. awther, auther, athir, owther, outhir, other, contr. or (whence mod. E. or, the correlative of either, conj.), < AS. æghwæther, contr. æghther, auther, athir (= OFries. ahweder, auder, ouder = D. ieder = MLG. ieder, ider = OHG. ēowedar, ēowedar, ēowedar, MHG. ieweder, ieweder, iweder, icder, G. jeder), either, each, < ā, ever, in comp. an indef. prefix, + hwæther, pron, whether: this form being thus identical, with the exception of the prefix ge, with the first form. Hence, with a negative prefixed, neither, q. v. The regular literary pronunciation of either, according to history and analogy, is ē'thēr (and so neither, nē'thēr); but the dialectal pronunciation ā'thēr, which preceded the present literary pronunciation ē'thēr, and the pronunciation i'thēr, which has now some currency even among educated persons, all have historical justification.] I. a. 1. Being one or the other of two, taken indifferently or as the case requires: referring to two units or particulars of a class: as, it can be done in either way; take either apple; the boat will land on either side.

Spirits, when they please,

Can either sex assume, or both.

Milton, P. L., l. 424.

2. Being one and the other of two; being both of two, or each of two taken together but viewed separately: as, they took seats on either side.

In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was thore the tree of life. Rev. xxii. 2.

The pastor was made to take his seat before the altar, with his two sacristans, one on either side. Prescott.

[In this use, each or both, according to construction, is nearly if not quite always to be preferred. Properly, either refers indefinitely to one or the other of two (and often in actual use, though less accurately, to some one of any number); each, definitely to every one of two or any larger number considered individually: a distinction of significance which ought to be maintained, since interchange of the words (less practised by careful writers now than formerly) offers no advantage, but may create ambiguity. Both, two together, one and the other taken jointly, should be preferred when this is the specific sense; but both and each may often be interchanged. Thus, the camp may be pitched on either side of the stream (on one or the other side indifferently); there were two camps, one on each side; the camp was pitched on both sides (one camp, divided); there are fine buildings on both sides of the street, or on each side, but not on either side.]

II. pron. 1. One or the other; one of two, taken indifferently.

Note the bark of that on some old chimney

Thou outher of the other two.

Joseph of Arimathea (E. E. T. S.), p. 7.

And bothe hostes made to-gader grete loye, as soone as eyder of hem myght sen other. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), li. 148.

Lepidus flatters both,

Of both is flatter'd; but he neither loves,

Nor either cares for him. Shak., A. and C., II. 1.

2. Each of two; the one and the other. [See remarks under I., 2.]

The king of Israel and Jehoshaphat sat either of them on his throne. 2 Chron. xviii. 9.

Either's heart did ache

A little while with thought of the old days.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 294.

either (ē'thēr or i'thēr: see either, a, etym.), conj. [< ME. either, eyther, etc., awther, auther, other, etc., contr. also or, which now prevails as the second form in the correlation either . . . or. Hence, with a negative prefixed, neither, q. v. See either, a, and pron.] 1. In one case;

according to one choice or supposition (in a series of two or more): a disjunctive conjunction, preceding one of a series of two or more alternative clauses, and correlative with or before the following clause or clauses. Sometimes, as in poetry, or is used before the first clause also.

It befalleth the sumtime, that Cristene men becomen Sarazines, outher for povertie, or for symplenesse, or elles for here owne wykkednesse. Mandeville, Travels, p. 141.

Either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth. 1 Ki. xviii. 27.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., II. 19.

= Syn. 1. To emit, extrude. — 2. To out, dislodge.

eject (ē-jekt'), n. [L. ejectum, neut. of ejectus, pp. of ecicere, ecicere, eject: see eject, v.] That which is ejected; specifically, in philos., a reality whose existence is inferred, but which is outside of, and from its nature inaccessible to, the consciousness of the one making the inference: thus, the consciousness of one individual is an eject to the consciousness of any other.

But the inferred existence of your feelings, of objective groupings among them similar to those among my feelings, and of a subjective order in many respects analogous to my own — these inferred existences are in the very act of inference thrown out of my consciousness, recognized as outside of it, as not being a part of me. I propose, accordingly, to call these inferred existences ejects, things thrown out of my consciousness, to distinguish them from objects, things presented in my consciousness, phenomena. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 72.

ejecta (ē-jek'tā), n. pl. [L. pl. of ejectum, neut. of ejectus, pp. of ecicere, ecicere, eject: see eject, v.] Things that are cast out or away; refuse.

Dust and other ejecta played but a secondary part in the production of the phenomena.

Amer. Meteor. Jour., III. 109.

ejectamenta (ē-jek-tā-men'tā), n. pl. [L. pl. of ejectamentum, that which is cast out, < ejecare, cast out: see eject, v.] Things which have been cast out; ejecta; refuse.

Facts . . . indicate that a considerable portion of the new mountain may be composed of ejectamenta.

Science, V. 68.

ejection (ē-jek'shon), n. [L. ejectio(n)-, < ejecere, pp. of ecicere, ecicere, eject. 1. The act of ejecting, or the state of being ejected; expulsion; dismissal; dispossession; rejection.

Then followed those tremendous adventures, those perils by sea, by wreck, by false brethren, by anxious searckers; those ejections upon islands, those labours by the way, which complete in me the portrait of St. Paul.

Bale, in R. W. Dixon's Hist. Church of Eng., xxi.

Our first parent comforted himself, after his ejection out of Paradise, with the foresight of that blessed seed of the woman which should be exhibited almost four thousand years after.

Bp. Hall, Select Thoughts, § 30.

Some of these alterations are only the ejections of a word for one that appeared to him more elegant or more intelligible.

Johnson, Pref. to Shakespeare.

2. That which is ejected; matter thrown out or expelled.

They [laminated beds alternating with and passing into obsidian] are only partially exposed, being covered up by modern ejections. Darwin, Geol. Observations, I. 62.

Action of ejection and intrusion, in Scots law, an action brought when lands or houses are violently taken possession of by another, for the purpose of recovering possession with damages and violent profits. — Letters of ejection, in Scots law, letters under the royal signet, authorizing the sheriff to eject a tenant or other possessor of land who had been decreed to remove, and who had disobeyed a charge to remove, proceeding on letters of horning on the decree.

ejective (ē-jek'tiv), a. [eject + -ive.] 1. Pertaining to ejection; casting out; expelling.

It was the one thing needful, I take it, to prove that the sun is an orb possessing intense eruptive or ejective energy. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XL. 422.

2. In philos., of the nature of an eject. [Recent.]

This conception symbolizes an indefinite number of ejects, together with one object which the conception of each eject more or less resembles. Its character is therefore mainly ejective in respect of what it symbolizes, but mainly objective in respect of its nature.

W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 74.

ejectively (ē-jek'tiv-lī), adv. 1. By ejection.

— 2. In philos., as an eject. [Recent.]

Mental existence is already known to them ejectively, although, as may be conceded, never thought upon subjectively.

N. A. Rev., CXL. 254.

ejectment (ē-jekt'ment), n. [eject + -ment.] An ejecting or casting out; specifically, a dispossession; the act of dispossessing or ousting.

Driving him [the devil] out, in the face of the whole congregation, by exorcisms and spiritual ejectments.

Warburton, Doctrine of Grace, II. 4.

Action of ejection, in law, a possessory action, wherein the title and real property may be tried and the possession recovered, wherever the party claiming has a right of entry. See casual ejector, under casual.

ejector (ē-jek'tōr), n. One who or that which ejects. Specifically — (a). In law, one who ejects another from or dispossesses him of his land. (b). A device for utilizing the momentum of a jet of steam or air under pressure to lift a liquid or a finely divided solid, such as sand, dust, or ashes. In the simplest form two pipes are placed one within the other, the larger one having a conical shape at the place where the smaller one enters it. A jet of steam or air passing from the smaller pipe upward into the larger pipe tends to cause any liquid, as oil or water, within reach to rise in the larger pipe. In oil-wells such a device is used to raise the oil to the surface. In another form of ejector, for lifting water, the smaller pipe enters a bend of the larger pipe near the top, the force of the jet tending to lift water through the pipe from below. The steam-ejector is also used to lift ashes from the furnace-room of a steamer and to discharge them through a pipe passing overboard above the water-line. The ejector is also used to exhaust the air of a vacuum-brake; in this case the steam-jet moves a column of air instead of water. (c). A device for throwing cartridge-shells from a firearm after firing. The common ejector of single- and double-barreled breech-loaders is a bolt underneath the gun-barrel, with a head fitted to the rim of the bore, working automatically back and forth in closing and opening the arm; in the latter movement the head catches against the rim of the shell and pushes it out of the barrel. There are many other devices, as a spring-lever, etc. — Casual ejector. See casual.

ejector-condenser (ē-jek'tōr-kōn-den'sēr), n. In a steam-engine, a form of condenser operated by the exhaust-steam from the cylinder.

ejido (ā-hē'dō), n. [Sp. = Pg. exido, a common, < L. exitus, a going out, exit: see exit.] In Spanish and Mexican law, a common; a public inclosed space of land. By the laws of Spain pueblos or towns and their inhabitants were entitled to four square leagues of land for their general and common use. This tract was called the ejido. In the American law reports the word is used in the plural, and spelled variously ejidos, ehidos, egidos, exidos.

ejoo (ē'jō), n. [Of Malay origin.] The fiber of the gomuti.

ejulation (ē-jē-lā'shon), n. [L. ejulatio(n)-, < ejulare, also deponent hejulari, wall, lament, < heu, het, ei, an exclamation of grief or fear.] An outcry; a wailing; a loud cry expressive of grief or pain; mourning; lamentation.

No ejulation

Tolled her knell; no dying agony

Frown'd in her death.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, xviii. 53.

Instead of hymns and praises, he breaks out into ejulations and effeminate wailings. Government of the Tongue.

ejuration (ē-jē-rā'shon), n. [LL. ejuratio(n)-, ejuratio(n)-, an abjuring, a resigning, < L. ejurare, ejurare, abjure, renounce, resign, < e, out, + jurare, swear.] Solemn disavowal or renunciation. Bailey, 1727.

eka-. [Skt. eka, one. Cf. dui-.] In chem., a prefix attached to the name of an element and forming with it a provisional name for a hypothetical element which, according to the periodic system of Mendeleeff, should have such properties as to stand in the same group with the element to which the prefix is made and next to it. For example, eka-aluminium was the provisional name given by Mendeleeff to a hypothetical element which in the periodic system should have such properties as to stand in the same group as aluminium and next to it. The recently discovered element gallium agrees in properties with those ascribed to eka-aluminium, and this name is now abandoned.

eke (ēk), v. t.; pret. and pp. eked, ppr. eking. [Early mod. E. also eeke, eeek; < ME. eken, also assimilated eechen (> E. dial. etch), < AS. ēcan īcan, īcan (pret. ēcte, pp. ēced) (= OS. ōkian, ōcōn = OHG. ouhōn, ouhōn, auhōn = Icel. auka (pret. aukadhi) = Sw. ōka = Dan. ōge), increase, cause to grow; secondary form, prop. caus. of ēcan* (pret. ēce*, pp. ēccen*), only in the pp. ēccen (= OS. ōcan, īccōcan), as adj., increased, enlarged, made pregnant, = OS. ōcan* = Icel. auka (pret. jök) = Goth. aukan (pret. aiuk), intr., grow, increase; = L. augere, increase; prob. connected with Gr. αὐγάνω, αὐξέω, increase, which is akin to E. wax, increase. Hence eke, adv. and conj.] 1†. To increase; enlarge; lengthen; protract; prolong.

God myghte not a poynte my joles েকে.

Chaucer, Troilus, III. 1509.

Spare, gentle sister, with reproch my paine to েকে.

Spenser, F. Q., III. vi. 22.

2. To add to; supply what is lacking to; increase, extend, or make barely sufficient by addition: usually followed by out: as, to eke out a piece of cloth; to eke out a performance.

More bent to eke my smartes
Then to reward my trusty true intent,
She gan for me devise a grievous punishment.
Spenser, F. Q., III. vii. 55.

In order to eke out the present page, I could not avoid pursuing the metaphor.
Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 5.

It was their custom, from father to son, to eke out the frugal support derived from this little domain by the business of a smith, to which the oldest son was habitually brought up.
Everett, Orations, II. 5.

eke (ēk), n. [*< ME. eke, also assimilated eche, < AS. eaca, an increase, < eacan, increase: see eke, v.] Something added to something else. Specifically—(a) A short wooden cylinder on which a beehive is placed to increase its capacity when the bees have filled it with comb. [Scotch.]

Neighbour defines eke as half a hive placed below the main hive, while a whole hive has in the same way is called a "nadir."
Phin, Dict. Apiculture, p. 51.

(b) Same as eking, 2.
eke (ēk), adv. and conj. [*< ME. eke, eek, ek, ec, < AS. eac = OS. ēk = OFries. āk = D. ook = LG. āk, āk, auk = OHG. ouh, ouch, MHG. ouch, G. auch = Icel. auk = Sw. och = Dan. og, and, also, = Goth. auk, for, also; prob. the adverbial acc. of a noun (cf. Icel. at auk, besides, to boot, AS. tō eacan, besides, moreover), < AS. eacan, etc., increase: see eke, v.] Also; likewise; in addition. [Obsolete or archaic.]

The emperor & ek sible spoken prophesie,
And thei acorden bothe in feere.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 45.

Up Una rose, up rose the lyon ek.
Spenser, F. Q., I. iii. 21.

A train-band captain ek was he Of famous London town. Cowper, John Gilpin.

ekebergite (ēk'e-bērg-īt), n. [After the Swedish mineralogist Ekeberg.] A variety of scapolite.

ekenamet (ēk'nām), n. [ME. ekename, ekname (= Icel. auknafn = Sw. öknamn = Dan. øgenavn), an added name, < eke, an addition, increase, eken, add, + name, name: see eke and name. Hence, by misdividing an ekename as a nekename, the form nickname, q. v.] An added name; an epithet; a nickname. See nickname.

We have thousands of instances . . . of such ekenames or epithet-names being adopted by the person concerned.
Archæologia, XLIII. 110 (1871).

ekia (ē'ki-ā), n. The wild African dog.
eking (ē'king), n. [Also eking; early mod. E. also eking; < ME. *eking, eching; verbal n. of eke, v.] 1. The act of adding.

I dempt there much to have eeked my store,
But such eking hath made my hart sore.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., September.

2. That which is added. Specifically—(a) A piece of wood fitted to make good a deficiency in length, as the end of a knee of a ship and the like.

Eking is the name given to the timber which, resting upon the shelf, ekes out or fills up the spaces between the apron and the foremost beam, and between the stern post and aftermost beam—the deck hook and deck transom . . . connecting the two sides.

Theatre, Naval Arch., § 210.

(b) The carved work under the lower part of the quarter-piece of a ship at the aft part of the quarter-gallery. Also eke.

eklogite, n. See eclogite.

el14, n. An absolute spelling of ell1.

el12, n. See ell2.

el- [*L. el-, < Gr. ἔλ-, assimilation of ev- before λ.*] An assimilated form of *en-*2 before l, as in el-tipse.

-el1. [ME. -el, < AS. -el, a noun-suffix, prob. orig. same as -ere, E. -er. Cf. -al, -ar, and see -el1.] A suffix of Anglo-Saxon origin, forming nouns, originally denoting the agent, from verbs, as in runnel: in modern English, except after n, usually written -le, as in bead-le, beet-le1, beet-le2, etc. See -el1.

-el2. [(1) OF. -el, mod. -el, -eau, m., -elle, f., < L. -ellus, -ella, -ellum, parallel to -illus, etc., being usually dim. -lus, with assimilation of a preceding consonant. The suffix -l (-lo-, -lu-, -el, etc.) is a common Indo-European formative, with different uses, diminutive, agential, or adjective. It appears also in -let, q. v. (2) See -al, etc.] 1. A suffix originally and still more or less diminutive in force, sometimes of Teutonic origin, as in hatch-el (= hack-le, heck-le), but usually of Latin origin, as in chap-el, cup-el, tunn-el, etc.—2. A suffix of various origin, chiefly Latin, as in chatt-el, chann-el, kenn-el2, etc. (where it represents Latin -alis, E. -al), fenn-el, funn-el, etc. See these words.

E la1 (ē lā). In medieval music, the second E above middle C: so named by Guido, in whose system it was the highest tone: hence often used by the old dramatists to denote the extreme of any quality, but especially any extravagant or hyperbolic saying.

Necessitie . . . made him . . . stretch his braines as high as E la to see how he could recouer pence to defray his charges.
Greene, Never Too Late.

There are some expressions in it [Dryden's "State of Innocence"] that seem strain'd and a note beyond E la.
Langbaine, Dram. Poets (ed. 1691), p. 72.

elaboracy (ē-lab'ō-rā-si), n. [< elaborate, a.: see -acy.] Elaboration. [Rare.]

A minute elaboracy of detail.

P. Robinson, Harper's Weekly, June 7, 1884, p. 367.

elaborate (ē-lab'ō-rāt), v.; pret. and pp. elaborated, ppr. elaborating. [< L. elaboratus, pp. of elaborare (> It. elaborare = Sp. Pg. elaborar = F. élaborer), labor greatly, work out, elaborate, < e, out, + laborare, labor: see labor, v.] I. trans.

1. To produce with labor; work out; produce in general.
The honey, that is elaborated by the bee, . . . affords a great deal of pleasure to the bee herself.
Boyle, Works, II. 355.

Or, in full joy, elaborate a sigh. Young, Love of Fame.

If the Orchidees had elaborated as much pollen as is produced by other plants, relatively to the number of seeds which they yield, they would have had to produce a most extravagant amount, and this would have caused exhaustion.
Darwin, Fertil. of Orchids by Insects, p. 288.

Specifically—2. To improve or refine by successive operations; work out with great care; work up fully or perfectly.

There has been up to the present day an endeavour to explain every existing form of life on the hypothesis that it has been maintained for long ages in a state of balance; or else on the hypothesis that it has been elaborated, and is an advance, an improvement, upon its ancestors.
E. R. Lankester, Degeneration, p. 29.

Often . . . a speaker's thought is not weighty enough to sustain elaborated style of any kind, and, least of all, elaborated imagery.
A. Phelps, English Style, p. 285.

II. intrans. To be or become elaborate; be elaborated. [Rare.]

This custom [of burying a dead man's movables with him] elaborates as social development goes through its earlier stages.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 103.

elaborate (ē-lab'ō-rāt), a. [= F. élaboré = Sp. Pg. elaborado = It. elaborato, < L. elaboratus, pp.: see the verb.] Wrought with labor; finished with great care and nicety of detail; much studied; executed with exactness; highly finished: as, an elaborate discourse; an elaborate performance.

The Expressions are more florid and elaborate in these Descriptions than in most other Parts of the Poem.
Addison, Spectator, No. 321.

His style would never have been elegant; but it might at least have been manly and perspicuous; and nothing but the most elaborate care could possibly have made it so bad as it is.
Macaulay, Miltord's Hist. Greece.

What an elaborate theory have we here,
Ingenuously nursed up, pretentiously Brought forth! Browning, Ring and Book, I. 177.

= Syn. Labored, perfected, highly wrought.

elaborately (ē-lab'ō-rāt-lī), adv. In an elaborate manner; with elaboration; with nice regard to exactness.

I believe that God is no more mov'd with a prayer elaborately pend, then men truly charitable are mov'd with the pen'd speech of a Begger. Milton, Eikonoklastes, xxiv.

elaborateness (ē-lab'ō-rāt-nes), n. The quality of being elaborate, or wrought with great labor.

Yet it [the "Old Bachelor"] is apparently composed with great elaborateness of dialogue, and incessant ambition of wit.
Johnson, Congreve.

elaboration (ē-lab'ō-rā'shon), n. [= F. élaboration = Sp. elaboración = Pg. elaboração = It. elaborazione, < L. elaboratio(n-), < elaborare: see elaborate.] 1. The act of elaborating, or working out or producing; production or formation by a gradual process: as, the elaboration of sap by a tree.

Elaboration is a gradual change of structure, in which the organism becomes adapted to more and more varied and complex conditions of existence.
E. R. Lankester, Degeneration, p. 32.

2. The act of working out and finishing with great care and exactness in detail; the act of improving or refining by successive processes; painstaking labor.

It is not my design in these papers to treat of my subject . . . to the full elaboration. Boyle, Works, IV. 596.

3. Labored finish or completeness; detailed execution; careful work in all parts: as, the elaboration of the picture is wonderful.

elaborative (ē-lab'ō-rā-tiv), a. Serving, tending, or having power to elaborate; working out with minute attention to completeness and to details; laboriously bringing to a state of completion or perfection.—Elaborative faculty, in psychol., the intellectual power of discerning relations and of viewing objects by means of or in relations; the understanding, as defined by the German philosophers; the discursive faculty; thought: a phrase introduced by Sir William Hamilton.

elaborator (ē-lab'ō-rā-tor), n. [= *F. élaborateur, < L. as if elaborator, < elaborare, elaborate: see elaborate, v.] One who or that which elaborates.

elaboratory (ē-lab'ō-rā-tō-ri), a. and n. [< elaborate + -ory. As a noun, after laboratory.] I. a. Elaborating; tending to elaborate. [Rare.]

II. n. A laboratory.

He shew'd us divers rare plants, caves, and an elaboratory.
 Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 1, 1665.

In this retreat of mine, shall I have the use of mine elaboratory?
Scott, Kenilworth, xviii.

elabrate (ē-lā'brāt), a. [*< NL. elabratu, < L. e-priv. + labrum, lip: see labrum.] Having no labrum: an epithet applied in entomology to the mouth when it has no distinct labrum or upper lip, as in the spiders and most Diptera.

Elacate (ē-lak'ā-tē), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑλακᾶτα, dial. ἑλακᾶτα, ἑλακᾶτα, a distaff.] The typical genus of fishes of the family Elacatidae. E. canada is a food-fish of the Atlantic coast of North America and the West Indies, reaching a length of 5 feet and a weight of from 15 to 20 pounds. It is variously known as the sergeant-fish, coalfish, bonito, cubby-yew or cobia, and crab-eater. See cut under cobia.

elacatid (ē-lak'ā-tid), n. A fish of the family Elacatidae.

Elacatidæ (ē-lak'ā-tī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elacate + -idæ.] A family of scombriform fishes, of fusiform shape, with depressed head, smooth scales, lateral line concurrent with the back, eight free spines representing the first dorsal fin, a long second dorsal and anal fin, and acutely lobed tail. The cranium is also characteristic. The type is the cobia or sergeant-fish, Elacate canada. See cut under cobia.

elacatoid (ē-lak'ā-toid), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Elacatidæ.

II. n. An elacatid.

elachert (ēl'ā-chērt), n. Same as degote.

Elachistea (ēl'ā-kis'tī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλαχιστος, superl. of ἐλαχός, small.] A small genus of olive-brown filamentous marine algae, belonging to the Phaeosporæ, which grow in small tufts attached to other algae, especially Fuaceæ. The basal part of the tuft is composed of densely packed branching filaments, which at the surface branch corymbosely, so as to form a layer of short filaments (paraphyses). At the base of the latter are borne the sporangia and a series of long, unbranched filaments. Elachistea fucicola is the commonest species in Great Britain and America.

Elachistinae (ēl'ā-kis'tī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Elachistus + -inae.] A subfamily of insects, of the parasitic hymenopterous family Chalcididae. They have four-jointed tarsi, slender hind thighs, distinct parapsides, and a submarginal vein reaching the costa without a break. The species are all parasitic, and some of the larvae spin irregular cocoons, differing in this respect from most other Chalcididae.

Elachistodon (ēl'ā-kis'tō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλαχιστος, superl. of ἐλαχός, small, + ὄδοντος (ὄδοντ-, tooth).] A genus of Elaphidion, colubriiform serpents of the subfamily Dasypeltinae, having esophageal teeth formed by enameled processes of cervical vertebrae projecting into the gullet (as in the genus Dasypeltis), but smooth scales, head little distinct from the body, a grooved maxillary tooth, and a loreal plate. E. westermanni is an example. Reinhardt, 1863.

Elachistus (ēl'ā-kis'tus), n. [NL. (Spinola, 1811), < Gr. ἐλαχιστος, superl. of ἐλαχός, small.] The typical genus of Elachistinae (which see), characterized by the one-spurred hind tibiae and metallic colors. In Europe 60 species have been described, and in North America 6; the latter are parasitic upon tortricid larvae. Sometimes wrongly spelled Elachestus.

Elæagnaceæ (el'ê-ag-nâ'sê-ê), n. pl. [NL., < Elæagnus + -aceæ.] A small natural order of apetalous exogens, scattered over the northern hemisphere. They are trees or shrubs, covered with silvery or brown scales, and having alternate or opposite leaves, and small white or yellow flowers. There are only 3 genera, Elæagnus, Hippophaë, and Shepherdia, including about 25 species, of which 4 are American.

Elæagnus (el'ê-ag'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλαῖος or ἐλαγνός, a Bæotian marsh-plant, perhaps myrica, sweet gale, < ἐλαία, olive-tree, + ἀγνός, equiv. to λύγος, a willow-like tree: see agnus castus, under agnus.] A genus of shrubs or small trees, the type of the order Elæagnaceæ, of about 20 species. The fruit, sometimes edible, is a spurious drupe formed of the fleshy calyx-tube inclosing about 30 species, sparsely scattered through tropical regions. E. croceum furnishes the saffron-wood of Natal. E. glaucum is a native of Ceylon and Comorand, and is known by the name of Ceylon tea.

Elæodes (el'ê-ô'dêz), n. [NL. (Eschscholtz, as Eleodes), < Gr. ἐλαῖος, contr. of ἐλαοειδής, oily, < ἐλαῖον, olive-oil, oil, + είδος, appearance.] A genus of beetles, of the family Tenebrionidae, containing large species with the tarsi spinose or setose, and the connate elytra partly embracing the body: so called from the oily fluid discharged by the insects when irritated. There are about 50 species, all of the United States, where they take the place of the species of Elaps in the old world. E. obscura and E. gigantea are examples; the latter is 1½ inches long. The fluid, as in Elaps, is secreted by two glands near the anus, and is sometimes ejected to a distance of three or four inches. It has a penetrating and indescribably offensive odor. Also spelled Eleodes.

elæodocho (el'ê-ôd'ô-kon), n.; pl. elæodocha (-kâ). [< Gr. ἐλαοδόχος or -δόχος, holding oil, < ἐλαῖον, olive-oil, oil, + δέχομαι, δέκω, receive, contain.] The uropygial gland or rump-gland of a bird; the oil-gland, a kind of sebaceous follicle saddled upon the pope's-nose at the root of the tail.

It is composed of numerous slender tubes or follicles, which secrete the greasy fluid, and the ducts of which, uniting successively in larger tubes, finally open by one or more pores, commonly upon a little nipple-like elevation. Birds press out a drop of oil with the beak, and dress the feathers with it, in the operation called preening. The gland is large and always present in aquatic birds, which have need of a water-proof plumage; it is smaller in land-birds, as a rule, and wanting in some. The character of the elæodocho, whether it be bare or surmounted by a circlet of feathers, distinguishes various natural groups of birds.

elæolite (e-lê'ô-lit), n. [< Gr. ἐλαῖον, olive-oil, oil, + λίθος, a stone.] A coarse massive variety of nephelite, of a waxy, greasy luster, and presenting various shades of green, gray, and red. The predominance of soda in its composition renders its alteration a frequent source of zeolites, as thomsonite. Also elæolite.

elæolite-syenite (e-lê'ô-lit-si'e-nit), n. A rock composed essentially of the minerals elæolite and orthoclase, and having a granitoid structure. With these minerals are very commonly associated others in lesser quantity, such as plagioclase, augite, hornblende, biotite, magnetite, apatite, zircon, sodalite, and sphene. The most important and classic occurrence of elæolite-syenite is in southern Norway, where it is the repository of many interesting minerals and of several of the very rare metals, such as yttrium, cerium, niobium, etc. Varieties of the rock containing considerable zircon have been frequently designated as zircon-syenite; a variety from Miask, Russia, with much mica, is known as miascite; one from Mount Foya in Portugal, which was supposed to contain hornblende, as foyalite; and one from Ditro in Transylvania, containing sodalite and spinel, as ditroite.

elæometer (el'ê-om'e-têr), n. [< Gr. ἐλαῖον, olive-oil, oil, + μέτρον, a measure.] A hydrometer for testing the purity of olive- and almond-oils by determining their densities. Also elæiometer.

elæoptene (el'ê-op'tên), n. [< Gr. ἐλαῖον, olive-oil, oil, + πτερόν, winged.] The liquid portion of volatile oils, as distinguished from the concrete or crystallizable portion, called stearoptene (which see). Also elæopten, oleoptene.

elæosaccharine (e-lê-ô-sak'a-rin), a. [< Gr. ἐλαῖον, olive-oil, oil, + σάκχαρον, sugar.] Containing both oil and sugar.

elaic (e-lâ'ik), a. [< Gr. ἐλαϊκός, < ἐλαία, the olive-tree: see olive.] Same as oleic.

elaidate (e-lâ'i-dât), n. [< elaidic + -ate.] In chem., a salt formed by the union of elaidic acid with a base.

elaidic (el'â-id'ik), a. [< Gr. ἐλαῖς (ἐλαῖδ), equiv. to ἐλαία, the olive-tree, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to oleic acid or elain.—Elaidic acid, C₁₈H₃₄O₂, a fatty acid forming crystalline leaflets, obtained from oleic acid by adding nitrous or hyponitrous acid.

elaidin, elaidine (e-lâ'i-din), n. [< Gr. ἐλαῖς (ἐλαῖδ), the olive-tree, + -in, -ine.] In chem., a fatty substance, white, crystalline, produced by the action of nitric acid upon certain oils, especially castor-oil.

elain, elaine (e-lâ'in), n. [= F. elaine; < Gr. ἐλαία, olive-oil, oil, + -in, -ine.] The liquid principle of oils and fats: same as olein.

elaiodic (el'â-od'ik), a. [< Gr. ἐλαῖος, oily (see Elæodes), + -ic.] Derived from castor-oil: as, elaiodic acid.

elaiometer (el'â-om'e-têr), n. Same as elæometer.

elaldehyde (e-lal'dê-hid), n. [< Gr. ἐλαῖον, oil, + aldehyde.] In chem., a solid polymeric modification of acetaldehyde, containing three molecules in one. Perhaps identical with paraldehyde.

Elamite (ê'lam-it), n. and a. [< Elam (see def.) + -ite.] 1. An inhabitant of ancient Elam, a country east of Babylonia, commonly regarded as corresponding nearly to the old province of Susiana in Persia (now Khuzistan).

II. a. Pertaining to Elam or the Elamites.

elamp (ê-lamp'), v. i. [< L. e, out, + E. lamp: see lamp.] To shine.

As when the cheerful sun, elamping wide,
Glads all the world with his uprising ray.

G. Fletcher, Christ's Victory and Triumph, l.

This, indeed, is deformed by words neither English nor Latin, but simply barbarous, as elamping, eliazon, deprostrate, purpured, glitterand, and many others.

Hallam, Introduct. Lit. of Europe, iii. 5.

élan (â-loh'), n. [F., < élancer, shoot, incite, refl. rush forward, dash: see elance.] Ardor inspired by enthusiasm, passion, or the like; dash.

elance (e-lâns'), v. t. [< F. élancer, < é (L. e), out, + lancer, dart, hurl, < lance, a lance.] To throw or shoot; hurl; dart. [Rare.]

While thy unerring hand elanc'd
Another, and another, dart, the people Joyfully repeated Io!

Prior, tr. of Second Hymn of Callimachus.

Elance thy thought, and think of more than man.
Young, Night Thoughts, ix.

eland (ê'land), n. [< D. eland, an elk (in South Africa applied to the eland), = G. elend, elen (> F. élan), elendthier, elk, < Lith. elvis = Pol. jelen = Bulg. jelent, elk. See elk.] 1. The Cape elk, Oreos canna, a large bubaline antelope of South Africa, standing 5 feet high at the withers, and weighing from 700 to 900 pounds. Its flesh is much prized, especially the hams, which are dried and used like tongue. It has in consequence been almost extirpated in the neighborhood of Cape Colony, where it formerly abounded. Also called elk.

Our party was well supplied with eland flesh during our passage through the desert; and it being superior to beef, and the animal as large as an ox, it seems strange that it has not yet been introduced into England. Livingstone.

2. A name sometimes used for the moose.

elanet (el'a-net), n. [< Elanus + dim. -et.] A kite or glade of the genus Elanus. G. Cuvier.

Elanoides (el-a-noi'dêz), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1848, after Vieillot, 1818), < Elanus + Gr. είδος.] A genus of birds, of the family Falconidae; the swallow-tailed kites. The tail is extremely long and deeply forficat, the wings are long and pointed, the feet the one-seeded nut. Several species are cultivated for their ornamental silvery-scurfy foliage, especially the oleaster, E. angustifolia, of Europe, and several variegated varieties from Japan. The silver-berry, E. argentea, with silvery berries, is a native of northern America.

Elæis (e-lê'is), n. [NL., so named in reference to palm-oil, yielded by the African species, < Gr. ἐλαῖον, olive-oil, oil in general, < ἐλαία, the olive-tree: see oil and olive.] A genus of palms, of 3 or 4 species, found in Africa and tropical South America, with low stems and pinnate leaves. The fruit is red or yellow, consisting of a fleshy and oleaginous pericarp surrounding a hard nut. The oil-palm of Africa, E. guineensis, is common along the western coast, where the oil obtained from the fruit forms an article of food and export. It is also cultivated in Brazil and elsewhere. See palm-oil.

Elænia (e-lê'ni-â), n. [NL. (Sundevall, 1835, in the form Elainia).] An extensive genus of small olivaceous flycatchers of Central America, of the family Tyrannidae, sometimes giving name to a subfamily Elæniinae. There are about 20 species of Elænia proper, such as E. pagana, E. placens, etc. The name of the genus refers to the prevailing olivaceous coloration of the species. Also written Elainia, Elania, Eleneia.

Elæniinae (e-lê'ni-i'nê), n. pl. [NL., < Elænia + -inae.] A subfamily of Tyrannidae, named from the genus Elænia. The bill is in most cases compressed and but sparingly bristled, contrary to the rule in Tyrannidae; the feet are feeble and the wings generally short. The prevailing colors are olive greens and browns, whence the birds are collectively known as olive-tyrants. They are distributed over all the Neotropical region, reaching to the border of the United States. The limits of the subfamily are not fixed; Schater admits 19 genera. Also Elæniinae, Elæniinae, Elainiinae, Elainiinae.

elæoblast (e-lê'ô-blâst), n. [< Gr. ἐλαῖον, oil, + βλαστός, germ.] In zool., the urochord of certain ascidians; a rudimentary notochord, occurring in the embryos of the salps.

The placenta becomes more sharply marked off from the body of the embryo, at the posterior end of which a structure known as the elæoblast—the equivalent of the notochord—makes its appearance. . . . The embryo is born as a small fully developed salpa, which, however, still possesses the remains of the placenta and the elæoblast.

Claus, Zoology (trans.), II. 107.

elæoblastic (e-lê-ô-blas'tik), a. [< elæoblast + -ic.] Pertaining to the elæoblast; composing the elæoblast: as, elæoblastic cells.

Elæocarpus (e-lê-ô-kâr'pus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλαία, the olive-tree, + καρπός, fruit.] A genus of trees and shrubs, of the order Tiliaceæ, containing 50 species, natives of India and Australia and the intervening islands. They have simple leaves and racemes of small flowers. The fruit is an oblong or globose drupe, consisting of a rough bony nut surrounded by a fleshy pulp. In India the fruit of several species is used in curries, or pickled like olives. Some species of Australia and New Zealand yield a light but very tough wood.

Elæodendron (e-lê-ô-den'dron), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλαία, the olive-tree, + δένδρον, a tree.] A ce-lastraceous genus of small trees or shrubs, of Elanus (el'-a-nus), n. [NL. (Savigny, 1809), < Gr. ἐλαίνω, drive, set in motion: see elastic.] A genus of small milvine birds, of the family Falconidae; the pearl kites. They have a weak bill and claws; very short tarsi, feathered part way down in front, but elsewhere finely reticulate; long, pointed wings; short, square, or emarginate tail, with broad feathers; and white coloration in part, tinged with pearl-gray, and relieved by black in masses. There are several species in warm and temperate countries. The black-winged kite, E. melanopterus, is an example. The white-tailed kite, E. leucurus or E. leucurus, is a common bird in the northern United States.

elalite (e-lá'-lī-tē), n. Same as elvolite.

elaopten (el-ā-op'ten), n. Same as elaeoptene.

Elaphidion (el-a-fid'-i-on), n. [NL. (Serville, 1834), < Gr. ἐλαφος, a deer, + dim. suffix -idion.] A genus of longicorn beetles, of the family Cerambycidae, containing species of moderate or less setigerous, and the antennae free at the base. About 30 species are known, 11 of them North American. E. riparius, about a quarter of an inch long, is a common European species.

elaphure (el'-a-fūr), n. [Elaphurus.] A large deer, Elaphurus davidianus, of northern China, remarkable for the strong development and branching of the brow-antler and an inverse reduction of the other antlers, but otherwise related to the red deer and other species of the genus Cervus.

Elaphurus (el-a-fū'-rus), n. [NL. (Milne-Edwards), < Gr. ἐλαφος, the stag, + οὐρά, tail.] A genus of Cervidae related to the stag, but having a longer tail and inversely developed antlers. See elaphure.

Elaphus (el'-a-fus), n. [NL. (Hamilton Smith, 1827), < Gr. ἐλαφος, a stag.] A genus of Cervidae, containing such large deer as the American elk or wapiti, E. (Cervus) canadensis. See cut under wapiti.

elapid (el'-a-pid), n. A serpent of the family Elapidae.

Elapidae (ē-lap'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elaps, the typical genus, + -idae.] A family of venomous serpents, of the suborder Proteroglypha, order Ophidia, typified by the genus Elaps. They have poison-glands and grooved poison-fangs, behind which are usually solid hooked teeth, the palatine and pterygoid bones and the lower jaw having teeth also. The tail is not compressed. Species inhabit tropical and warm temperate regions of both hemispheres. Among them are the most poisonous of snakes, as the Indian cobra, Naja tripidiana, and the Egyptian asp, N. haje. Others are much less to be dreaded, as the harlequin-snake of the United States, Elaps fulvus. There are upward of 20 genera and numerous species. The family is restricted by Cope to forms lacking postfrontal bones, when most of the serpents usually placed in it are brought under Viperidae (which see). Also Elapidae. See cuts under asp, cobra-de-capello, and coral-snake.

elapidation (ē-lap-i-dā'-shon), n. [L. elapidatus, cleared from stone, < e, out, + lapidatus, pp. of lapidare, throw stones at, < lapis (lapid-), a stone; cf. dilapidate.] A clearing away of stones. Bailey, 1731. [Rare.]

elapoid (el'-a-poid), a. [Elaps + -oid.] Resembling a serpent of the genus Elaps; belonging or related to the Elapidae; cobraform, not erotaliform, as a venomous serpent.

Elaps (ē'-laps), n. [NL., a var. of elops, < L. elops: see Elops.] A genus of venomous serpents, giving name to the family Elapidae, having two nasal plates. The species are beautifully ringed with black and red, and some of them are called coral-snakes, as E. corallina of tropical America, and harlequin-snakes, as E. fulvus of North America. See cut under coral-snake.

elapse (ē-laps'), v. i.; pret. and pp. elapsed, ppr. elapsing. [L. elapsus, pp. of elabi, glide away, < e, out, away, + labi, glide, fall: see lapse.] 1. To slide, slip, or glide away; pass away with or as if with a continuous gliding motion: used of time.

Several years elapsed before such a vacancy offered itself by the death of the archpriest of Uzeda.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 5.

2t. To pass out of view or consideration; suffer lapse or neglect.

Such great acts do facilitate our pardon, and hasten the restitution, and in a few days comprise the elapsed duty of many months. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 189.

elapse (ē-laps'), n. [elapse, v.] The act of passing; lapse. [Rare.]

To sink themselves (the Pietists) into an entire repose and tranquility of mind. In this state of silence to attend the secret elapse and flowings in of the Holy Spirit, that may fill their minds with peace and consolation, joys or raptures. Addison, Remarks on Italy (ed. Bohn), I. 531.

After an elapse of years.

Annals of Phil. and Penn., I. 533.

Elapsidae (ē-lap'-si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elaps + -idae.] Same as Elapidae.

elapsion (ē-lap'-shon), n. [elapse + -ion.] The act of elapsing; lapse. E. Phillips, 1706. [Rare.]

elaqueate (ē-lak'-wē-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. elaqueated, ppr. elaqueating. [L. elaqueatus, pp. of elaquare, disentangle, < e, out, + laqueus, a snare.] To disentangle. Coles, 1717. [Rare.]

Elasipoda (el-a-sip'-ō-dā), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Elasmapoda.

elasmopod (el-as-mā'-pod), a. and n. I. a. Same as elasmopodus.

II. n. A member of the Elasmapoda.

Elasmapoda (el-as-map'-ō-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐλασμός, ēlaōma, a metal plate, + ποῖς (pod-) = E. foot.] An ordinal or other group of deep-sea holothurians. They exhibit distinct bilateral symmetry, having both a dorsal and a ventral surface, the ambulatory ambulacra confined to the latter, and the acephalic region usually specialized. About 50 species are known (all only recently), of several genera, as Elpidia, Kolpa, Irypa, etc. Also Elasipoda.

elasmopodous (el-as-map'-ō-dus), a. Pertaining to the Elasmapoda. Also elasmopod.

Elasmia (e-las'-mi-ē), n. pl. [NL.; cf. Elasmus.] A group of tineid moths. Hübner, 1816.

Elasminae (el-as-mī'-nē), n. pl. [NL. (Howard, 1886), < Elasmus + -inae.] A subfamily of Chalcididae, represented by the genus Elasmus, having four-jointed tarsi and swollen hind thighs. Also Elasmoidae.

elasmobranch (e-las'-mō-brang), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Elasmobranchii.

II. n. A vertebrate of the group Elasmobranchii.

elasmobranchian, elasmobranchiate (e-las-mō-brang'-ki-an, -ki-āt), a. and n. Same as elasmobranch.

Elasmobranchii (e-las-mō-brang'-ki-i), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐλασμός or ἐλασμα, a metal plate (see Elasmus), + βράγχια, gills.] A class, subclass, or order of fishes, otherwise known as Chondropterygii and Selachii, including the sharks and skates: so named from the lamellar branchia, or plate-like gills. These lamelliform gills are fixed both at their distal and proximal ends, so that they separate the branchial cavity into as many chambers as there are branchiae. The group is characterized by the cartilaginous skeleton, with the cranial elements not sutured together; the usually heterocercal tail, with the spinal column running into the upper lobe; the presence of pectoral and ventral fins; the mouth generally inferior,

B, from below. In part enlarged: ch, optic chiasm; a, pituitary body; n and v, vessels connected with a; s, sacculus vasculosus; b, pyramid of medulla oblongata; a, f, I, II, V, same as in A.

or on the under surface of the head; the gill-pouches and -slits usually 5, sometimes 6 or 7, generally with an equal number of external apertures, but in the Holocephali with only one on each side; the optic nerves chiasmal; the intestine with a spiral valve, and the arterial cone with pluriserial valves; and the skin either naked, or with placoid scales, forming shagreen or other armor. The division of the group varies; it is now usually divided into two sub-classes, Holocephali and Plagiostomi, the latter including the sharks and the rays.

Elasmodectes (e-las-mō-dek'-tēs), n. Same as Elasmognathus, 2.

Elasmodon (e-las'-mō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλασμός, a thin plate (see Elasmus), + ὄδους (ōdov-) = E. tooth.] A genus of elephants, the same as Elephas proper, or Euelephas, containing the Asiatic as distinguished from the African elephant of the genus Loxodon: so named by Falconer from the laminar pattern of the molars. See first cut under elephant.

Elasmognatha (el-as-mog'-nā-thā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of Elasmognathus: see elasmognathous.] In conch., a section of terrestrial pulmonate gastropods in which the jaw is elasmognathous. It includes the family Succiniidae.

elasmognathous (el-as-mog'-nā-thus), a. [L. Elasmognathus, < Gr. ἐλασμός, a thin plate, + γνάθος, jaw.] In conch., having a jaw with a quadrangular plate or appendage diverging from the upper margin: applied to the Succiniidae.

Elasmognathus (el-as-mog'-nā-thus), n. [NL.: see elasmognathous.] 1. A genus of American tapirs, characterized by having the nasal sep-large size, with moderately long spinose antennae and rounded thorax. About 20 species are known, all from North America and the West Indies. E. parallelum is a common species in the northern and eastern United States, about half an inch long, and ashy-brown in color; its larva bores into oak and hickory. Also Elaphidion.

elaphine (el'-a-fīn), a. [L. elaphus, < Gr. ἐλαφος, a deer: see Elaphus.] Pertaining to the red deer, Cervus elaphus, or to that section of the genus Cervus which this species represents.

Elaphodus (e-laf'-ō-dus), n. [NL. (Milne-Edwards, 1872), irreg. < Gr. ἐλαφος, a deer, + εἶδος, form.] A genus of muntjacs or Cervulinae of China, represented by Michie's tufted deer, Elaphodus.

Tufted Deer (Elaphodus michianus).

phodus michianus, formerly called Lophotragus, having unbranched antlers and no frontal cutaneous glands.

Elaphomyces (el-a-fom'-i-sēz), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλαφος, a deer, + μύκης, a mushroom.] A genus of subterranean fungi, belonging to the Tuberaceae. Elaphomyces granulatus, the common species, produces nearly spherical tuber-like conceptacles, varying from the size of a hazelnut to that of a walnut. The surface is covered with fine warts. The contents consist chiefly of the black spores, from 1 to 8 in each ascus.

Elaphridae (e-laf'-ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elaphrus + -idae.] A family of Coleoptera, named from the genus Elaphrus. Also Elaphridea, Elaphrides.

Elaphrus (e-laf'-rus), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1801), < Gr. ἐλαφρός, light in moving.] A genus of adephagous beetles, of the family Carabidae and subfamily Carabinae. They are of small size and stout form, with the elytra impressed, the mandi-tum or prolongation of the mesethmoid bone prominent and perfectly ossified. E. bairdi, the type, is a large Nicaraguan species about 40 inches long and 22 high. E. dovi is another Central American form. See cut under tapir.

2. A genus of extinct chimæroid fishes, later (1888) called Elasmodectes. Egerton.

Elasmoidæ (el-as-moi'dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elasmus + -oidæ.] Same as Elasmina. Förster, 1856.

elasmosaur (e-las-mō-sār), n. A reptile of the genus Elasmosaurus or family Elasmosauridæ.

Skeleton of an Elasmosaur (Elasmosaurus platyrus).

Elasmosauridæ (e-las-mō-sā'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elasmosaurus + -idæ.] A family of extinct natatorial reptiles, taking name from the genus Elasmosaurus.

Elasmosaurus (e-las-mō-sā'rus), n. [NL. (Cope, 1868), < Gr. ελασμός, ēlasma, a thin plate, + σαῦρος, sauros, lizard.] An American genus of extinct reptiles, of the order Sauropterygia, related to the plesiosaurs, but differing in the structure of the pectoral arch. A species was upward of 40 feet long, aquatic and piscivorous, with a very long neck, small head, paddle-like limbs and tail, and long, sharp teeth.

Elasmotheriidæ (e-las'mō-thē-ri'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elasmotherium + -idæ.] A family of extinct perissodactyl quadrupeds, without canines or incisors, and with a crenulated longitudinal ridge on the lower molars: a group having relationships with both the horse and the rhinoceros, but much more closely related to the latter in the order of ungulates. Gill, 1872.

Elasmotherium (e-las-mō-thē-ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ελασμός, a thin plate, + θηρίον, a wild beast.] The typical genus of the family Elasmotheriidæ.

Elasmus (e-las'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. ελασμός (also ēlasma), a metal plate, < ελαίνειν (ēla-), drive, strike, beat out: see elastic.] A genus of parasitic hymenopterous insects, of the family Chalcididæ, representing the subfamily Elasminæ, having four-jointed tarsi, enlarged hind femora, and the antennæ ramose in the male. The species are all of small size, and some are secondary parasites—that is, parasites of parasites. E. pullatus is a North American example. Westwood, 1833.

Elassoma (el-a-sō'mā), n. [NL. (Jordan, 1877), < Gr. as if ἐλασσωμα*, a diminution, loss, defect, defeat, < ἐλασσω, make less, < ἐλάσσω, less, compar. of ελαχίς, little, small.] A genus of very small fresh-water fishes of North America, representing the family Elasmodidæ.

elassome (el'a-sōm), n. A fish of the family Elasmodidæ. D. S. Jordan.

Elasmodidæ (el-a-sōm'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elasmosoma + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, represented by the genus Elasmosoma. They have an oblong compressed body covered with rather large cycloid scales, no lateral line, unarmed opercular bones, conic teeth in the jaws, and toothless palate; the dorsal fin is short and has about 4 spines, the anal still smaller with 3 spines, and the ventral thoracic and normal, with 1 spine and 5 rays. Only two species are known: they inhabit sluggish streams and ponds of the southern United States, and are among the smallest of fishes, rarely exceeding 1½ inches in length. Also Elasmodidæ.

elasmoid (e-las'ō-moid), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Elasmodidæ.

II. n. An elassome.

elastic (ē-lās'tik), a. and n. [Formerly also elastic (first recorded in the form elastic: see first quot.); = F. élastique = Sp. elástico = Pg. elástico (cf. D. G. elastisch = Dan. Sw. elastisk), < NL. elasticus (NGR. ελαστικός), elastic, < Gr. as if ελαστής*, for ελατής, equiv. to ελατήρ, a driver, hurler (see elater), < ελαίνειν (ēla-), drive, set in motion, push, strike, beat out.] I. a. 1. Serving, as a catapult, to hurl missiles by the force of a spring.

By what elastic engines did she rear
The starry roof, and roll the orbs in air?

Sir R. Blackmore.

2. Having, as a solid body, the power of returning to the form from which it is bent, extended, pressed, pulled, or distorted, as soon as the force applied is removed; having, as a fluid, the property of recovering its former volume after compression. A body is perfectly elastic when it has the property of resisting a given deformation equally, however that deformation may have been produced, whether slowly or suddenly, etc. All bodies, however, have different elasticities at different temperatures, and if the deformation is so sudden as to change the temperature of the body and so alter its resistance to deformation, this is not considered as showing it to be imperfectly elastic.

For the more easy understanding of the experiments triable by our engine, I thought it not superfluous nor unreasonable, in the recital of this first of them, to insinuate that notion by which it seems likely that most, if not all of them, will prove explicable. Your Lordship will easily suppose that the notion I speak of is that there is a spring, or elastic power, in the air we live in. By which ελασπ or spring of the air, that which I mean is this: that our air either consists of, or at least abounds with, parts of such a nature that, as soon as they be bent or compressed by the weight of the incumbent part of the atmosphere, or by any other body, they do endeavor, as much as in them lieth, to free themselves from that pressure, by bearing against the contiguous bodies that keep them bent; and as soon as those bodies are removed, or reduced to give them way, by presently unbending and stretching out themselves, either quite, or so far forth as the contiguous bodies that resist them permit, and thereby expanding the whole parcel of air these elastic bodies compose.

A body is called elastic in which a particle moved from its natural position of equilibrium has a tendency to return to its first position as soon as the external cause which had displaced it has ceased. Blaserna, Sound (trans.), p. 4.

Figuratively—3. Admitting of extension; capable of expanding and contracting, according to circumstances; hence, yielding and accommodating: as, an elastic conscience; elastic principles.

A volunteer navy may in some degree supply the place of privateers, supposing that plenty of time and an elastic organization are at command.

J. R. Soley, Blockade and Cruisers, p. 169.

4. Possessing the power or quality of recovering from depression or exhaustion; able to resist a depressing or exhausting influence; capable of sustaining shocks without permanent injury: as, elastic spirits.

The herds are elastic with health.

Landor.

Curve of elastic resistance. See curve.—Elastic belting, a material made in bands from half an inch to several inches in width, plain or striped, and having thin strips of india-rubber lying in the direction of its length and covered by woven material of cotton, silk, or the like, which completely conceals the india-rubber, unless the belting is stretched. The threads of rubber are usually square in section, having been cut from thin sheets.—Elastic bitumen. Same as elaterite.—Elastic button. See button.—Elastic cartilage, cartilage represented in the pinna, the epiglottis, and elsewhere, which is opaque, yellowish, flexible, and tough, and in which the matrix except in the immediate vicinity of the cells is permeated by numerous elastic fibers.—Elastic curve. See curve.

—Elastic fabric, a cloth or ribbon into which threads of rubber called elaters are woven.—Elastic fibers, in anat., fibers of elastic quality traversing the intercellular substance of connective tissue. They are of a light-yellow color, branch and anastomose freely, and strongly resist chemical treatment.—Elastic flannel. See flannel.—Elastic fluid, a fluid which has the property of expanding in all directions on the removal of external pressure, as gases and vapors. See gas.—Elastic glue. See glue.—Elastic gum, india-rubber.—Elastic mineral pitch, a brown, massive, elastic variety of bitumen.—Elastic mold, a mold of glue used for copying casts.—Elastic tissue, in anat., connective tissue made elastic by the presence of abundant elastic fibers. Such tissue is found in the middle coat of arteries, the larynx, Eustachian tube, yellow ligaments of the vertebrae, etc., and forms in some animals the ligamentum nuchæ. Mixed with cartilage, it constitutes a variety of the latter known as yellow or elastic fibrocartilage.—Elastic type, a type made of roller-composition (glue, glycerin, and sugar) or prepared gutta-percha, which yields under impression: used generally in the form of a stereotype for hand-stamping with ink, for which elasticity is desirable.—Elastic webbing, a material similar to elastic belting, but of greater width.

II. n. A piece or strip of india-rubber, or of webbing or belting made elastic by the incorporation of india-rubber, used as a band, garter, or the like. [U. S.] elasticity (ē-lās'ti-kāl), a. [See elastic.] Same as elastic.

elastically (ē-lās'ti-kāl-i), adv. In an elastic manner; with elasticity or power of accommodation.

Comedy . . . elastically lending itself to the tone and taste of the times without sacrificing the laws of its own being.

A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., Int., p. xxxv.

elastician (ē-las'tish'an), n. [elastic + -ian.] A person devoted to the advancement of the knowledge of elasticity.

elasticity (ē-las'tis'i-ti), n. [= F. élasticité = Sp. elasticidad = Pg. elasticidade = It. elasticità = D. elasticiteit = G. elastizität = Dan. Sw. elastisitet, < NL. elasticitas (t-), elasticity, < elasticus, elastic: see elastic and -ity.] The property of being elastic, in any sense; especially, that physical force resident in the smallest sensible parts of bodies, by virtue of which the holding of them in a state of strain (change of size or shape) involves work, which for small strains is proportional to the square of the amount of the strain. There are different kinds of elasticity, corresponding to the different kinds of strain.

If the restitution of a springy body, forcibly bent, proceed only from the endeavor of the compressed parts themselves to recover their former state, one may not impatiently take notice of the elasticity that iron, silver and brass acquire by hammering.

Boyle, Great Effects of Motion.

On the fingers of the queen were ten gold rings, the hoops of which were not continuous, but open like bracelets to admit of elasticity.

C. T. Newton, Art and Archæol., p. 382.

Never did the finances of the country give stronger evidence of vitality, soundness, and elasticity than was produced when Lowe, on opening the budget of 1871 on April 20, showed the yield of the revenue for 1870-1 to have exceeded the estimate by two millions and a quarter.

S. Dowell, Taxes in England, II. 363.

He [Berkeley] returned . . . to have the primacy of Ireland within his reach. But we always feel that he has not the same elasticity and heartiness of life as before.

Scotsman (newspaper).

Axis of elasticity, axis of direct elasticity. See axis.

Coefficient of elasticity. See coefficient.

Elasticity of bulk, resistance to change of bulk.—

Elasticity of shape, resistance to change of shape.—

Fresnel's surface of elasticity, a surface whose radii vectors are proportional to the square roots of the elastic forces which, upon Fresnel's theory of light, are exerted in the directions of those radii round any point of a crystalline body.—Light-elasticity. See light.—

Limit of elasticity, an amount of deformation which if applied to a body is such that if made any greater the body will not completely spring back when released.—

Modulus of elasticity, the ratio of stress to strain: also termed the elasticity simply. See modulus.—Perfect elasticity, the property of being perfectly elastic. See elastic, a. 2.

Elasticness (ē-lās'tik-nes), n. Elasticity.

Bailey, 1727. [Rare.]

elastin (ē-lās'tin), n. [elastic + -in.] In chem., a body closely resembling albumen, except that it is free from sulphur, forming the principal substance of the elastic fiber which is the characteristic constituent of certain tissues.

elatchee (ē-lach'ē), n. [Hind. elāchi, ilāchi.]

Cardamom.

Where, by the potent sun elated high,

The vineyard swells refulgent on the day.

Thomson, Autum.

2. To raise or swell, as the mind or spirits; elevate with satisfaction or gratification; puff up; make proud.

Though elated by his victory, he still maintained the appearance of moderation.

Hume, Hist. Eng.

He [Gilbert White] brags of no fine society, but is plainly a little elated by "having conversed acquaintance with a tame brown owl."

Lovell, Study Windows, p. 2.

elate (ē-lāt'), a. [ME. elat, < L. elatus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. Raised; lifted up. [Poetical and archaic.]

And sovereign law, that state's collected will,

O'er thrones and globes, elate,

Sits empress.

Sir W. Jones.

2. Exalted in feeling; elated.

This kyng of kynges proud was and elant;

He wende that god, that sit in magestee,

Ne myght hym nat breue of his estaat.

Chaucer, Monk's Tale (ed. Skeat), B. 3357.

Those promising youths, . . . like sons of the morning, elate with empty hopes and glittering outsides.

Bacon, Moral Fables, i, Expl.

Who feels his freehold's worth, and looks elate,

A little prop and pillar of the state.

Crabbe, Works, i. 176.

= Syn. 2. Exultant, jubilant, exhilarated, overjoyed, puffed up, proud.

elatedly (ē-lā'ted-li), adv. With elation.

Nero, we find, defied most in the foulest mists of luxury, and where do we find any so elatedly proud, or so unjustly rapacious as he?

Feltham, On Luke xiv. 20.

elatedness (ē-lā'ted-nes), n. The state of being elated. Bailey, 1731.

elatement (ē-lāt'ment), n. [elate + -ment.]

The act of elating, or the state of being elated;

mental elevation; elation.

A sudden elatement swells our minds.

Hervey, Meditations, II. 54.

elater¹, elator (ē-lā'tēr, -tōr), n. [elate + -er, -or.] One who or that which elates.
elater² (el'ā-tēr), n. [NL. elater, < Gr. ἐλατήρ, a driver, hurler, < ἐλαίνω (ēla-), drive, set in motion: see elastic.] 1. Elasticity; especially, the expansibility of a gas.

It may be said that the swelling of the compressed water in the pewter vessel lately mentioned, and the springing up of the water at the hole made by the needle, were not the effects of an internal elater of the water, but of the spring of the many little particles of air dispersed through that water. Boyle, Spring of the Air, Exp. xxii.

2. [NL.] In bot.: (a) One of the four club-shaped filaments of Equisetaceae, attached at one point to a spore, formed by the splitting of the outer coat of the spore. They are strongly hygroscopic, and aid in the dispersion of the spores, also keeping a small group together, as they leave the sporangium. See cut under Equisetaceae. (b) One of the long and slender fusiform cells of Hepaticae having one or more spiral thickenings within. They loosen the spores in the capsule at the time of their dispersion. (c) One of the similar free filaments of Myxomycetes forming part of the capillitium, and frequently having spiral thickenings. They are sometimes furnished with spines. Their characters are useful in distinguishing species.—3. [NL.] In entom.: (a) [cap.] The typical genus of the family Elateridae, founded by Linnaeus in 1767. It comprises over 100 species, of which nearly 50 inhabit North America. They are mostly found in temperate regions, on leaves and flowers, or oftener under bark. They are distinguished from members of related genera by the filiform fourth tarsal joint, oblong-oval scutellum, small regularly convex head, and the approximate single-toothed dilatation of the hind coxae. (b) One of the Elateridae; a click-beetle. (c) One of the elastic bristles at the end of the abdomen of the Poduridae. A. S. Packard. See spring.

elaterid (el-at'e-rid), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Elateridae.

II. n. One of the Elateridae; a click-beetle, spring-beetle, or skipjack.

Elateridæ (el-a-ter'i-dæ), n. pl. [NL., < *Elater*², 3 (a), + -idæ.] A family of sternoxine pentamerous beetles, corresponding to the Linnaean genus Elater. The ventral segments are typically free, the first not being elongated; the tarsi are 5-jointed; the prothorax is loosely jointed to the mesothorax; the prosternum is prolonged behind; the globose front coxae are within the prosternum; the hind coxae are contiguous, laminate, and sulcate; the free ventral segments are 5 or rarely 6 in number; the labrum is free and visible; and the antennae are usually serrate, sometimes filiform, pectinate, or flabellate. The species are very numerous, and are known as click-beetles, snapping-beetles, spring-beetles, and skipjacks. Their legs are short, and when they are placed on their backs on a flat surface they right themselves with an audible snapping of their bodies. This is effected by means of the spine of the prosternum, which acts as a spring on the mesosternum, and the force being transmitted to the base of the elytra, and so to the supporting surface, the insects are jerked into the air and manage to fall on their feet. The force is remarkable, as one may experience by trying to hold one of the larger species. (See cut under click-beetle.) The freeflies of tropical regions are elaters, as of the genus Pyrophorus. (See cut under antenna.) The larvae of many species are known as wireworms, and are very injurious to crops. See cut under wireworm.

elaterin, elaterine (el-lat'e-rin), n. [elaterium + -in, -ine.] A neutral principle (C₂₀H₂₈O₈) extracted by alcohol from elaterium. When pure it forms colorless hexagonal crystals, which are odorless and have a bitter, acid taste. It is used in medicine in minute doses as a very powerful hydragogue cathartic.

elaterist (el-at'e-ris-t), n. [*elater*² + -ist.] One who holds that many of the phenomena connected with the air-pump are to be explained by the elasticity of the air, and who maintains the truth of Boyle's law that the density of a gas is proportional to the pressure.

Although our author [Linus] confesses that air has a spring as well as a weight, yet he resolutely denies that spring to be near great enough to perform those things which his adversaries (whom for brevity sake we will venture to call elaterists) ascribe to it.

Boyle, Defence against Linus, ii.

elaterite (el-lat'e-rit), n. [elaterium + -ite.] An elastic mineral resin of a blackish-brown color, subtranslucent, and occurring in soft flexible masses. Also called elastic bitumen and mineral caoutchouc.

elaterium (el-a-tē-ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλατήριον, driving, driving away, neut. ἐλατήριον, sc. φάρμακον, an opening medicine, < ἐλατήρ, a driver, < ἐλαίνω (ēla-), drive: see *elater*².] 1. A substance obtained from the fruit of the Ecballium Elaterium, or squirting cucumber, which, if it is gathered a little before it ripens, and the juice gently expressed, deposits a green sediment, which is collected and dried. Good elaterium operates as a drastic purge, and is generally administered in cases of dropsy. It contains elaterin, together with starch, resin, etc.

2. In bot., a fruit consisting of three or more dehiscent cocci, as in Euphorbia. Richard. [Not used.]

elaterometer (el'ā-tē-rom'e-tēr), n. [Gr. ἐλατήρ, a driver (see *elater*², 1), + μέτρον, a measure.] An air-pressure or steam-pressure gage.

elaterist (el'ā-tē-ri), n. [Gr. ἐλατήριος, driving; see elaterium.] Acting force or elasticity: as, the elaterist of the air. Ray.

elatin (el'ā-tin), n. [elat(erium) + -in.] A substance extracted from elaterium by alcohol: probably a mixture of elaterin and chlorophyll. See elaterin.

Elatinaceæ (el-lat-i-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Elatine + -aceæ.] An order of small polypetalous herbs with opposite leaves and axillary flowers, including only 2 genera and about 20 species; the waterworts. See Elatine.

Elatine (el-at'i-nē), n. [NL., < L. elatine, a plant of the genus Antirrhinum, < Gr. ἐλατήριον, a species of toadflax, so called from some resemblance to the fir or pine, fem. of ἐλάτινος, of the fir or pine, < ἐλάτν, the silver fir, prob. so called in reference to its straight, high growth, < ἐλατός, verbal adj. of ἐλαίνω, drive, push: see elastic, *elater*².] A genus of very small annual herbs, typical of the order Elatinaceæ, growing in water or mud, and found in temperate or subtemperate regions around the globe, known as waterwort. Four species occur in the United States.

elation (ē-lā'shōn), n. [ME. elacion, < L. elatio (n), a carrying out, a lifting up, < elatus, pp. of efferre, carry out, lift up: see elate.] Elasticity of feeling due to some special cause or occasion; an exultant condition of the mind, as from physical enjoyment, success, or gratification of any kind; mental inflation; exultation.

Elacion is when he ne may neither suffre to have mais-ter ne felawe. Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

God began to punish this vain elation of mind, by withdrawing his favours. Bp. Atterbury.

What to youth belong,
Gay raiment, sparkling gauds, elation strong.
M. Arnold, Austerity of Poetry.

Elatobranchia (el'ā-tō-brang'ki-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐλατός, verbal adj. of ἐλαίνω, drive, push, + βράγχια, gills.] A group of mollusks.

elator, n. See *elater*¹.

elaterometer (el-a-trom'e-tēr), n. [Gr. ἐλατήρ, a driver (see *elater*², 1), + μέτρον, a measure.] In physics, an instrument for measuring the degree of rarefaction of the air in the receiver of an air-pump.

elayle (el'ā-il), n. [Gr. ἐλαιον, olive-oil, oil, + ἔλν, matter.] Same as ethylene.

Elberfeld blue. See blue, n.

elbow (el'bō), n. [= Sc. elbowk; < ME. elbowe, < AS. elnboga, and contr. elboga (= D. elleboog = LG. elbeuge = OHG. elnpoga, elnpogo, elniboga, MHG. elenboge, G. ellenboge, elboge = Icel. ölnbogi, and contr. ölbogi, now ölbogi, formerly alnibogi, alnogi = Dan. albu; cf. Sw. armbåge), elbow, < eln, ell, in the orig. sense of 'forearm,' + boga, a bow, in the orig. sense of 'a bend': see ell and *bow*². Cf. ulna and cubit.] 1. The bend of the arm; the angle made by bending the arm at the junction of the upper arm with the forearm.

And preide to god for hem bothe ladyes and maidenies in the chirches upon their knees and elbowes, that god shoide hem speide and defende fro deth.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 246.

The wings that waft our riches out of sight Grow on the gamester's elbowes.

Cowper, Task, iii. 761.

There leaning deep in broider'd down we sank
Our elbowes.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.

2. In anat., the elbow-joint and associate structures. See elbow-joint.—3. Something curved or bent like the human elbow; specifically, a flexure or angle of a wall or road, especially if not acute; a sudden turn or bend in a river or the sea-coast; a jointed or curved piece of pipe for water, smoke, gas, etc., designed to connect two lines running at an angle to each other.—4. In carp., etc., one of the upright sides which flank any paneled work. See crosset.—5. The raised arm of a chair or end of a sofa, designed to support the arm or elbow.

But elbowes still were wanting; these, some say,
An alderman of Cripplestreet contriv'd.
And some ascribe th' invention to a priest,
Burly, and big, and studious of his ease.

Cowper, Task, i. 60.

6. A shoulder-point in cattle. Grose. [Local, Eng.]—At one's elbow, near at hand; convenient; within call.

They know them to have bin the main corrupters at the Kings elbow.
Milton, Eikonoklastes, xxiv.

Sir Roger, planting himself at our historian's elbow, was very attentive to everything he said. Spectator, No. 329.

Elbow in the hawse (naut.), a turn or half-twist produced in the cables of a ship when moored, caused by her swinging twice the wrong way.—In at elbows, in comfortable or decent circumstances.

I don't suppose you could get a high style of man . . . for pay that hardly keeps him in at elbows.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, xxxviii.

Out at elbows, having holes in the elbows of one's coat; hence, in a dilapidated or impoverished condition; at odds with fortune; unfortunate.—To crook the elbow. See crook.—To rub or touch elbows, to associate closely; be intimate.—To shake the elbow, to gamble: from the motion of shaking a dice-box.

He's always shaking his heels with the ladies, and his elbows with the lords.
Vanbrugh, Confederacy, i.

Up to the elbows (in anything), very busy; wholly engaged or engrossed.

elbow (el'bō), v. [Elbow, n.] I. trans. 1. To push or shove with or as if with the elbow; hence, figuratively, to push or thrust by overbearing means; crowd: as, to elbow people aside in a crowd; to elbow a rival out of the way.

He'll . . . elbow out his neighbours. Dryden.

I would gladly abandon, of my own free will, the part I have in her fickle favour, but I will not be elbowed out of it by the clown Sussex or this new upstart.

Scott, Kenilworth, xvi.

2. To make or gain by pushing as with the elbows: as, to elbow one's way through a crowd.

As some unhappy wight, at some new play,
At the pit door stands elbowing a way.

Goldsmith, Good-natured Man, Epil.

II. intrans. 1. To jut into an angle; project; bend or curve abruptly, as a wall or a stream.—2. To jostle with or as if with the elbow; push one's way; hence, figuratively, to be rudely self-assertive or aggressive.

He that grows hot and turbid, that elbows in all his philosophical disputes, must needs be very proud of his own sufficiencies. Mannyngham, Discourses (1681), p. 50.

Purse-proud, elbowing Insolence, Bloat'd Empiric, puff'd Pretence.

Granger, Solitude.

elbow-board (el'bō-bōrd), n. The board at the bottom of a window which forms the inner sill.
elbow-chair (el'bō-chār), n. Same as arm-chair. [Now rare.]

The furniture . . . [consisted] of hangings made of old Genoa yellow damask, with a bed and elbow chairs of the same stuff, adorned with fringes of blue silk.

Smollett, tr. of Gil Blas, x. 8.

Necessity invented stools,
Convenience next suggested elbow-chairs.

Cowper, Task, i. 87.

elbow-cuff (el'bō-kuf), n. An attachment to the short elbow-sleeve of a woman's dress, worn about 1775. The cuff is or appears to be turned back so as to cover the elbow like a cap.

elbowed (el'bōd), a. [elbow + -ed.] Supplied with or shaped like an elbow; specifically, in entom., turning at an angle; kneed; geniculate: as, elbowed antennæ; elbowed marks. Westwood.

Picks, having straight tips converging to the eye, instead of being curved, are said to be elbowed or anchored.

Wm. Morgan, Man of Mining Tools, p. 74.

elbow-gauntlet (el'bō-gānt'let), n. A gauntlet of which the cuff covers the forearm nearly to the elbow-joint. It is sometimes prolonged on the outer edge of the arm so as to protect the elbow. During the sixteenth century such gauntlets of steel superseded the vambrace, and gloves of leather and quilted silk answering the same purpose were worn far into the seventeenth century.

elbow-grease (el'bō-grēs), n. A colloquial or humorous expression for energetic hand-labor, as in rubbing, scouring, etc.

He has scartit and dintit my gude mahogany past at the power o' bees-wax and elbow-grease to smooth.

Galt, The Entail, III. 84.

To clean a gun properly requires some knowledge, more good temper, and most elbow-grease.

Coxes, Field Ornith. (1874), p. 13.

elbow-guard (el'bō-gārd), n. Same as cubitière.
elbow-joint (el'bō-jōint), n. In anat., the articulation of the forearm with the upper arm; the joint formed by the articulation of the ulna and radius with the humerus. The head of the radius and the greater sigmoid cavity of the ulna, respectively, are apposed to the trochlear and capitellar surfaces of the humerus. In so far as the movement of the whole forearm upon the upper arm is concerned, the elbow-joint is the most strict ginglymus or hinge-joint in the body, having no lateral motion; but the head of the radius independently revolves in the lesser sigmoid cavity of the ulna, pivoted upon the capitellum of the humerus, in the movements of pronation and supination. The term is extended to the corresponding joint of the arm or fore limb of other animals, whatever its construction may be.

elbow-piece (el'bō-pēs), n. Same as cubitière.

elbow-plate (el'bo-plāt), n. 1. In paper-making, the cutter of the rag-cutting machine when bent to an angle in the middle.—2. An early name for the cubitière, denoting especially the simple form used during the thirteenth century. See cut under armor (fig. 2).

elbow-rail (el'bo-rāl), n. In a railroad-car, a part of the body-framing running horizontally along the sides at about the height of the elbow of a passenger in a sitting position. Car-Builders' Dict.

elbow-room (el'bo-röm), n. Room to extend the elbows; hence, freedom from confinement; ample room for motion or action.

Now my soul hath elbow-room. Shak., K. John, v. 7.

No sooner is he disappointed of that harbour then God provides cities of Hebron; Saul shall die to give him elbow-room. Ep. Hall, Abner and Joab.

elbow-scissors (el'bo-siz'grz), n. pl. Scissors which, for convenience in cutting, have a bend in the blade or shank.

elbow-shaker (el'bo-shā'kér), n. A dicier; a sharper; a gamester. Halliwel. [Old slang.]

elbow-shield (el'bo-shēld), n. The piece of armor protecting the elbow; a cubitière. See cut under armor (figs. 2 and 3). Hewitt.

elbow-sleeve (el'bo-slēv), n. A sleeve in a woman's dress, terminating at the elbow.

elbow-tongs (el'bo-tōngz), n. pl. A pair of heavy tongs with curved jaws.

elbuk (el'buk), n. A Scotch form of elbow.

elcaja (el-kā'jā), n. An Arabian tree, Trichilia emetica, the fruit of which is emetic, and also is sometimes used in the composition of an ointment for the cure of the itch.

Elcesaites, Elkesaites (el-sē'-, el-kō'sa-īt), n. One of a party or sect among the Jewish Christians of the second century, deriving their name from Elkasa or Elxai, either their founder or leader, or the title of the book containing their doctrines, which they regarded as a special revelation. Their belief and practices were a mixture of Gnosticism and Judaism, with much that was peculiar. They were finally confounded with the Ebionites.

elchi, elchee (el'chi, -chē), n. [Turk. and Pers., < Hind. elchi, an ambassador, envoy.] An ambassador or envoy. Also spelled elichi.

Things which they had told to Colonel Rose they did not yet dare to tell to the great Elchi (Lord Stratford de Redcliffe). Kinglake.

eld (eld), n. [= Sc. eld, < ME. eld, elde, elde, earlier ylde, < AS. ylde, yldo, rarely ældu, æld, eld, old age, an age, antiquity (= OS. eldi = OHG. alti, elti = Icel. öld = Dan. ælde = Goth. alds, age, an age), < eald, old: see old and world.] 1. Age: said of any period of life.

Fyfe hundredth wyntres I am of elde,
Me think ther geris as yestriday.

York Plays, p. 43.

Lest migte the faylled
In thyne olde elde. Piers Plowman (B), xii. 8.

That faire child was of foure ger elde.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 3498.

2. Old age; senility; also, an old person.

Weake eld hath left thee nothing wise.

Spenser, F. Q., II. iii. 16.

The weak fantasy of indigent eld. Lamb, Witches.

Time hath reft whate'er my soul enjoy'd,
And with the ills of Eld mine earlier years alloy'd.
Byron, Child Harold, ii. 98.

Green boyhood presses there,
And waning eld, pleading a youthful soul, Intreats admission. Southey.

3. An age; an indefinitely long period of time.

The thriddle werldes elde cam quanne [when] Thare begat Abram. Genesis and Exodus, I. 705.

4. Time.

This storie olde . . .
That elde which al can frete and bite . . .

elder¹ (el'dér), n. [(1) ME. pl. eldren, ældren, aldren, aldren, ealdren, and (with double pl.) eldrene, elderne, also (with pl. of adj. in positive) eldre, eldere, also (prop. pl. of (2), below) elderes, eldres, elders, rarely olders, (a) parents, (b) ancestors; (2) ME. rarely in sing. eldere, eldere, alder, alder, (c) a chief; the forms and senses being mixed in ME., but distinct in AS.: < AS. (1) ylđran, ældran, ældran (ONorth. aldro), (a) parents, (b) ancestors (rarely in sing. ylđra, parent, father, = OFries. aldera, ieldera, alder, elder = OS. aldro, aldro, pl. aldron, eldiron = G. eltern, pl., parents, voeltern, ancestors, = Dan. forældre = Sw. förlädrar, pl., parents), pl. of ylđra, etc., adj. compar. of eald, old: see elder¹, a.; (2) AS. ealdor, aldor, pl. ealdras, aldras, (a) an elder, parent, (b) ancestor, also and more commonly (c) a chief, prince, < eald, old, + -or; orig. identical with the compar. adj.] 1. One who is older than another or others; an elderly person.

To fructife also this is honest,

That yonger men obeye unto thaire eldron

In gouernynge, as goode and buxom children.

Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 6.

At the board, and in private, it very well becometh children's innocency to pray, and their elders to say Amen.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

He led a blooming bride,

And stood a wither'd elder at her side.

Crabbe, Parish Register.

The tavern-hours of mighty wits,
Thine elders and thy betterers.

Tennyson, Will Waterproof.

2. A forefather; a predecessor; one of a former generation in the same family, class, or community.

By it [faith] the elders obtained a good report.

Heb. xi. 2.

Carry your head as your elders have done before you.

Sir R. L. Estrange.

3. In the Old Testament, a title of indefinite signification applied to various officers, but generally indicating in the earlier history the princes or heads of tribes, and afterward men of special influence, dignity, and authority in their local community. In the New Testament the elders are the lay element in the Sanhedrin, the supreme court of the Jewish nation in the first century.

Gather unto me all the elders of your tribes, and your officers, that I may speak these words in their ears.

Deut. xxxi. 23.

Her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land.

Prov. xxxi. 23.

In the first instance, at any rate originally, the head of the first house was always the head of the clan, that of the first clan also that of the tribe. All these three grades of the heads of the people, who would thus reach the total of 1,728, might certainly be also designated by one common name, and in all probability this was furnished by the name "head" or "father," also more definitely the "head of the fathers," but more frequently by the name we so often meet with of elder.

Ewald, Antiq. of Israel (trans.), p. 245.

4. In the New Testament, also the title of certain officers in the Christian church, whose functions are not clearly defined, but who apparently exercised a considerable control in the conduct of the local churches. Scholars are not agreed as to the limits or nature of their authority. The Presbyterians maintain that there were two classes of elders (1 Tim. v. 17; 1 Cor. xii. 28; Rom. xii. 6-8; Acts xv. 25, 26, xx. 28; Heb. xiii. 7, 17). The Congregationalists on the one hand, and the Episcopalians on the other, maintain that there was no distinction between ruling and teaching elders, the elder or presbyter being in their judgment identical with the pastor or shepherd of the flock (Acts xx. 28; 1 Thes. v. 12; Heb. xiii. 7, 17; 1 Tim. v. 17).

Elder is the translation of the equivalent word, which we still preserve in its Greek form of presbyter, and which is contracted through the old French forms prester and prestre, into priest. Smith, N. T. Hist., p. 447, note.

5. In certain Protestant churches, an officer exercising governmental functions, either with or without teaching or pastoral functions. (a) In churches of the Baptist persuasion the pastors of churches are usually called elders, although the class especially so called are not settled pastors, but evangelists and missionaries. (b) (1) In churches of the Presbyterian order the pastor of a church is technically called the teaching elder, as distinguished from the ruling elders, commonly called simply elders, who are a body of laymen, varying in number, selected to assist the pastor in the oversight and government of the church. The board of ruling elders constitute with the pastor the session of the church, and are intrusted with its government and discipline, subject to the supervision of the Presbytery. Such elders are required to accept the Symbol or Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church; they do not administer the sacraments, but aid in the Lord's supper by distributing the elements. They are sometimes elected for life, sometimes only for a term of years. (2) In the early days of Congregationalism many churches had, besides the pastor and teacher, a ruling elder, charged with matters of church government and discipline.

The congregation at Watertown (whereof Mr. George Phillips was pastor) had chosen one Richard Brown for their elder. Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 81.

I judg it not lawfull for you, being a ruling Elder, . . . opposed to the Elders that teach & exhorte and labore in ye word and doctrine, to which ye sacraments are annexed, to administer them, nor convenient if it were lawfull.

Robinson, Quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, [p. 167.]

(c) In some bodies of American Methodists elder is the general term for any clergyman. In the Methodist Episcopal Church the presiding elder is an ordained clergyman appointed by and serving under the bishop as superintendent, with large though carefully defined supervisory powers within a specified "district," which usually corresponds somewhat in extent to an average county in eastern States. In this district every minister is amenable to him, and every church is subject to his supervision and is usually visited by him three or four times during the year. He presides at Quarterly and often at District Conferences. Traveling elders are itinerant preachers appointed by the Annual Conference. (d) In the Mormon Church the elder is an officer whose duty it is "to preach and baptize; to ordain other elders, and also priests, teachers, and deacons; to lay on hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost; to bless children; and to take the lead of all meetings." The elders constitute the Melchizedek priesthood, and include the apostles, the Seventy, the evangelists or patriarchs, and the high priest. Mormon Catechism, xvii. (e) Among the Shakers, four elders, two males and two females (the latter also called eldresses), have charge of each of the aggregated families.

elder² (el'dér), n. [(1) < ME. elder, eldre, eldyr (with excrement d), eller, also ellerne, ellarne (whence mod. dial. eller, eldern, ellern, ellen-tree), < AS. ellen, the usual form, but earlier elhorn (in a Kentish gloss) = MLG. elhorn, alhorn, alherne, etc., LG. elloorn, elder, the elder-tree. (2) Another form appears in E. dial. hilder, < ME. hilder, hiller, hillor, hillerne, helderne (generally, like the other ME. forms, in connection with tree) = D. halder-(boom) (now vlier, vlier-boom) = Norw. hyll, hyll-tre = Sw. hyll, hyll-trä = Dan. hyld, hyld-træ, elder, elder-tree. (3) A third form appears in OHG. holantar, holantar, MHG. holander, holder, G. holunder, hohlbunder, holder, dial. holder. It is doubtful whether these three forms are ult. identical. Popular etym. has wrought confusion, e.g., in assimilating the forms with those of alder¹; cf. ME. elder, mod. dial. eller, LG. ellern, G. eller, alder. The third form, OHG. holantar, etc., appears to consist of hol-, the root of the word, popularly supposed to be identical with hol, mod. G. höhl, = AS. hol, hollow, + -an = AS. -en, inflexive or deriv. suffix, + -tar, MHG. -der, prob. (as in OHG. mazzol-trä, MHG. mazolter, G. massholder = AS. mapul-dor, -dorn, maple-tree) cognate with tree: cf. the Scand. forms with -tre, -trä, -træ. Some El Dorado (el dō-rá'dō), [Sp., lit. the golden: el, the (< L. ille, that); dorado, pp. of dorar, gild: see dorado and deaurate.] A country rich beyond all precedent in gold and jewels, which the early Spanish explorers believed to exist somewhere in the new world, and which Orellana averred that he had found in his voyage down the Amazon in 1540-41. This was soon disproved, but the search was continued down to the eighteenth century, and the name has become a synonym for any region said to abound in the means of easily acquired wealth. It was used with specific reference to California for some years after the discovery of gold there in 1848. Sometimes written as one word: as, the Eldorado of the West.

My sick brother, as in hospital-maladies men do, thou dreamest of Paradises and El Dorados, which are far from thee.

Cartley.

In Eldorado, we are told, the children in the streets play with nuggets of gold instead of marbles.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XL. 98.

2. Pertaining to or consisting in electricity: as, electric power; an electric discharge.

Some substances possess in a very high degree the capacity of transmitting the electric power or condition; others possess in a high degree the capacity of intercepting it.

Tyndall, Light and Elect., p. 147.

3. Derived from or produced by electricity: as, an electric shock; an electric light.—4. Conveying electricity; producing electricity; communicating a shock by electricity: as, an electric machine; electric wires; the electric eel or fish.

Certain fishes belonging to the genera Torpedo (among the Elasmobranchii), Gymnotus, Malapterurus, and Mormyrus (among the Teleostei), possess organs which convert nervous energy into electricity, just as muscles convert the same energy into ordinary motion. . . . The nerves of the electrical organs proceed from the fifth pair, and from the electric lobe of the medulla oblongata, which appears to be developed at the origin of the pneumogastries.

Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 54.

5. Operated by electricity: as, an electric bell; an electric railway.—6. Figuratively, full of fire, spirit, or passion, and capable of communicating it to others; magnetic.

See electric machine, below.—Electric absorption. See residual charge, under residual.—Electric action, in organ-building, a mechanism in which the connection between the keyboard and the pipes is made by the help of electricity.—Electric alarm, any alarm or signaling device controlled or operated by a current of electricity. The alarm is sounded by the closing of the electric circuit, which may be effected by a thermostat, a door, a sash, or other device, according to the purpose for which the alarm is used. See alarm, thermostat, and fire-alarm.—Electric annunciator, an apparatus by means of which the location of the point at which an electric circuit is made or broken is indicated. A number of electromagnets are connected, each with some particular station, room, or point from which a signal may come; the opening or closing of the circuit at any of these points operates the electromagnet to which it is joined, bringing into view a number, letter, or word indicating the location of the point. An alarm-bell is generally rung at the same time.—Electric apparatus, the various machines and appliances necessary for conducting electrical experiments, and illustrating the laws of electric action.—Electric atmosphere, electric aura. See aura.—Electric bridge, call-bell, clock current, displacement, eel, egg, fuse, governor, hammer, harpoon, etc. See the nouns.—Electric field, any space in which electric force exists.—Electric force, the force existing among bodies charged with electricity, due to the existence of the charge.—Electric lamp, the contrivance in which the electric light is produced.—Electric light, light produced by electricity; especially, a brilliant light for purposes of illumination obtained by means of a powerful current of electricity, generated by a magneto- or dynamo-electric machine. The light is of two general kinds, the arc-light and the incandescent light. In the first the voltaic arc is employed; in the second a resisting conductor is rendered incandescent by the current. The arc-light (see voltaic arc, under arc) is produced when a powerful current passes between two carbon electrodes, at first in contact and afterward separated a short distance, the result being the formation of the voltaic arc. The light of the arc and the glowing carbon-points has great intensity, and electric lamps of this kind are extensively used for purposes of illumination, where a powerful light (1,200 candle-power or upward) can be economically employed. In order to keep the carbon electrodes at a constant distance, so that the light may be uniform, some form of regulator is generally needed. Commonly an electromagnet, through which the current passes, is used for this purpose. As the carbons are slowly consumed the distance between them increases; the current meets with greater resistance, and is weakened accordingly; this in turn weakens the electromagnet, which acts less powerfully on its armature, and thus through some mechanical device causes the points to approach each other. If they come too near together, the strengthened current strengthens the electromagnet, and the same contrivance pulls them apart again; so that the current automatically regulates itself. In electric candles this necessity is done away with; here, as in the Jab-lockhoff candle, for example, the carbon pencils are placed side by side, separated by some insulating earthy substance, the arc is formed at the top, and the candle burns away in a manner analogous to that of an ordinary candle. With these candles alternating currents are employed to obviate the difficulty that would otherwise arise from the more rapid consumption of the carbon forming the positive pole. In an incandescent electric lamp, or glow-lamp, the current is made to pass through a strip of some substance which, because of its high resistance, becomes highly heated, and hence brilliantly incandescent. Practically, the only suitable substance known is carbon, which in the form of a thin strip or wire, carefully prepared for the purpose (for example, from a strip of bamboo and bent in a loop, is inclosed in a bulb of glass from which the air has been exhausted. The vacuum is essential to prevent the consumption of the carbon at the high temperature to which it is raised. The incandescent light is comparable in brilliancy to a good gas-burner, and is hence suitable for general house illumination; it is superior to gas in steadiness, and has the great advantage that it does not vitiate the air. The current employed has, for lamps of ordinary power, much less strength than that needed for the arc-light. The clutch-lamp is an arc-lamp in which the rod to which the upper carbon is attached is surrounded by an annular clutch, which is raised when the circuit is completed, thus establishing the arc.—Electric log, a ship's log in which the recording mechanism may be stopped by closing an electrical circuit through the tow-line when it is necessary to haul the log on board ship. Another form of electric log uses the recording mechanism to close a circuit through the tow-line, and report the record of the log on the vessel. See log.—Electric machine, a machine for generating large quantities of electricity. Those commonly used for producing static electricity depend upon either friction or induction for their operation. For producing current electricity a magneto-electric or dynamo-electric machine is employed. The frictional electric machine usually consists of a plate or cylinder of glass, which is made by means of a handle to revolve between stationary cushions whose surfaces are covered with amalgam. One form of electricity (positive) is generated on the revolving plate, and is taken off by combs to a large brass cylinder, called the prime conductor; the other (negative) is generated on the cushions, and may also be collected on a conductor, but is generally allowed to pass off to the earth through a metallic chain. The electricity obtained is the equivalent of the mechanical energy expended in turning the crank, less that which through friction is expended in producing useless heat. An induction-machine acts upon the principle of induction. Thus, in the Holtz machine no friction is used except to charge the armature. It consists of a primary glass plate with two open spaces, or "windows," on opposite sides of the center, and of a second glass plate which is revolved very rapidly in front of it. On the other side of the movable plate, and opposite the windows, are two combs connecting with brass conductors ending in large knobs. On one edge of each window is attached a piece of paper, called the armature, and a tongue of paper projects from it into the open space toward the revolving wheel. In the use of the Holtz machine and others of the same kind a small initial charge must first be communicated to the armature. By induction this is increased until a maximum, depending on the insulating power of the machine and its supports, is reached. The electrical energy developed has its equivalent in the work done in overcoming alternate attraction and repulsion of the moving and fixed parts. The effects of an induction-machine are much more powerful than those of the plate-machine, and it is less influenced by dampness in the air. It is consequently a very useful machine in the physical laboratory, being much used for static experiments. When a powerful current of electricity is required, a magneto-electric or dynamo-electric machine driven by a steam- or gas-engine, or by water-power, is employed. These machines depend upon the induction which takes place between magnets and coils of wire, when their relative positions are changed. (See induction.) The distinction between the magneto- and dynamo-machines is that in the former a permanent magnet is employed, while in the latter its place is taken by an electromagnet. A simple form of the first consists of a large horseshoe magnet, before the poles of which two bobbins wound with insulated copper wire and inclosing cores of soft iron are made to revolve; the variation in magnetic intensity and polarity as these soft iron cores alternately approach and recede from the poles of the permanent magnet produces induced currents in the wire of the bobbins. These currents are reversed for each half-revolution, and hence a machine of this type produces an alternating current. By the use of a commutator, however, the current may be rectified, so that it passes through the connecting wire always in the same direction. In another form of the machine the soft iron core is in the form of a ring, about which a number of separated coils of insulated wire are wound, the ends of which are taken to the central axis.

A, glass plate; B, rubber, hoisting arm; C, collecting points;
D, prime conductor.

nano-electric machine, or dynamo. The dynamo-machines in use are of many forms, but all consist essentially of one or more large electromagnets (called the field-magnets) between the poles of which an armature, consisting of a soft iron core wound with coils of insulated copper wire, is made to revolve very rapidly by means of an engine. In most of them the principle of reduplication is involved—that is, commencing with a very small amount of residual magnetism in the field-magnets, the inductive action between them and the revolving armature results in the production of a feeble current in the coils. This current may be made to pass through the wire of the stationary magnets, strengthening them so that they exert a stronger inductive influence on the armature, thus producing a strong current in the coils, which again charges more strongly the field-magnets, and so on until the machine is in full action. The charging of the field-magnets is accomplished in different ways. In some forms of the machine the field-magnets are excited by independent currents, produced by separate machines; in other forms (called series dynamos) the current generated in the armature charges the field-magnets, and is also used for the outside work, the coils of the electromagnets, in other words, forming part of the external circuit; in still other forms (called shunt dynamos) a portion only of the current generated in the armature is used to charge the field-magnets, the remainder being taken off for the practical outside work. Many different forms of the machine are now in use, and they have proved an economical and convenient means of obtaining powerful currents of electricity, when it is to be used for producing the electric light, for electroplating, for the transmission of power or energy, and so on. In the transmission of energy by electricity, the current produced by the machine is made to pass through a second machine (called an electric motor, generally similar to and often identical with the dynamo in form and construction, the order of working being reversed), distant a number of miles, perhaps, from the first, and there it causes the armature to revolve, and this revolution may be employed to do any kind of mechanical work. Dynamos have a high degree of efficiency, many transforming over 90 per cent. of the mechanical energy used in revolving the armature into the energy of the electric current. They furnish the electric current much more economically, as well as more regularly, than a voltaic battery, since the zinc, the fuel of the latter, is an expensive and a poor fuel, as compared with the coal used for the engine which drives the dynamo.—Electric meter, an instrument designed to measure the quantity of electricity supplied to consumers for the production of light or heat, or to be used as a motive power.—Electric motor. See electric machine.

—Electric organ.—Electric pendulum, a form of electroscope consisting of a pith-ball suspended by a non-conducting thread.—Electric piano. See piano.—Electric railway, a railway on which electricity is the motive power. The wheels of each car may be set in motion by an electric motor to which they are geared, or a motor-car may draw one or more cars. There are two distinct systems of electric railway. In one the electric motor is actuated by a current of electricity drawn from a secondary or "storage" battery carried with the car, generally underneath the floor; in the other the current is conveyed from a dynamo at some point on the line by means of conductors, which may be supported upon poles or placed in an underground conduit.—Electric storm, a violent disturbance of the electrical condition of the earth, resulting in strong earth-currents through long lines of telegraph, often interfering with the ordinary working of the line. These storms are sometimes widespread, and are thought by some physicists to be related to contemporaneous disturbances of the atmosphere of the sun. The phrase is also applied to unusually violent displays of atmospheric electricity.—Electric-telegraph cable. See cable.—Electric tension, difference of electric potential: often used as equivalent to electromotive force. (See also battery, cell, circuit, condenser, electricity, fluid, potential, telegram, telephone, tension, spark, unit.)

II. n. A body or substance capable of exhibiting electricity by means of friction or otherwise, and of resisting the passage of it from one body to another. See electricity.—To excite an electric. See excite.

electrical (ē-lek'tri-kal), a. [< electric + -al.] Same as electric.

It also includes the science and art of the erection and maintenance of telegraph and cable lines, of electric railway-signals, and other forms of electric signaling.—Electrical mortar, a small mortar within which a discharge is made to take place between two bodies charged with contrary electricities. This disruptive discharge causes so violent a disturbance of the air-particles as to expel a light ball placed in the mouth of the mortar. See Volta's pistol, under pistol.

electrically (ē-lek'tri-kal-i), adv. In the manner of electricity, or by means of it; as regards electricity.

electricalness (ē-lek'tri-kal-nes), n. The state or quality of being electrical. [Rare.]

electrician (ē-lek'tri-sh'an), n. [= F. electricien; as electric + -ian.] 1. One who studies electricity, and investigates its properties by observation and experiments; one versed in the science of electricity.—2. One engaged in the business of making or supplying electric apparatus or appliances.

electricity (ē-lek'tris-i-ti), n. [= D. elektricität = G. elektricität = Dan. Sw. elektricitet = F. électricité = Sp. electricidad = Pg. electricidade = It. elettricità, < NL. electricita(t)s, < electricus, electric: see electric.] In physics, a name denoting the cause of an important class of phenomena of attraction and repulsion, chemical decomposition, etc., or, collectively, these phenomena themselves. The true nature of electricity is as yet not at all understood; but it is probable that it is not, as was formerly assumed, of the nature of a fluid—either a single fluid as was supposed by Franklin, or two fluids (positive and negative), as was supposed by Symmer. The word was first used by Gilbert, the creator of the science of electricity, and by him was applied to the phenomena of attraction and repulsion as exhibited when amber (electrum) and some other substances of a similar character were briskly rubbed. Its meaning has been gradually extended to include a large variety of phenomena, among which may be named heating, luminous and magnetic effects, chemical decomposition, etc., together with numerous apparent attractions and repulsions of matter widely differing from those originally noted, but all of which are attributed to a common cause. The subject is usually divided into the two parts of static or frictional electricity, including the electricity produced by friction and analogous means, the phenomena of which are chiefly statical, and current electricity (also called voltaic electricity), including that produced by the chemical or voltaic battery and electromagnetic machines, the phenomena of which are mostly dynamical. The form of electricity first discovered was the frictional. The discovery is generally attributed to Thales (sixth century B. C.), who observed that amber, after being rubbed by silk, had the property of attracting light bodies, like bits of paper, bran, etc. It was subsequently discovered that glass, sulphur, resin, and many other bodies gained by friction this same property to a greater or less extent. When electricity is produced by the friction of silk on glass, that of the glass is called vitreous or positive electricity, while that of the silk rubber is called resinous or negative electricity. When produced by the friction of flannel or silk on sealing-wax, that of the wax is negative, and that of the flannel or silk rubber is positive. This distinction, which, however, is properly explained as due to a difference of electrical potential (see potential), extends through the whole subject, but whatever means the electricity is produced. It is found in a neutral body that the two kinds of electricity are produced in equal amounts. Besides friction, there are other means of exciting electricity, as pressure between two bodies or sudden fracture (by which means sugar becomes faintly luminous when broken in the dark). If a piece of sealing-wax is broken, the opposite ends will be found to be dissimilarly electrified. This is especially true of the fracture of cleavable minerals, like mica, calcite, etc. Some crystallized bodies become electrified by change of temperature; for example, a crystal of tourmalin, on being slightly warmed, becomes positively electrified at one extremity, and negatively at the other; if cooled, the poles are reversed. (See pyro-electricity.) For the chief means of obtaining a supply of frictional electricity, see electric machine, under electric, and electrophorus. The principal subjects considered under the head of static electricity are the distribution of electricity over the surface of a conductor, as determined by its shape or the proximity of other electrified bodies (see density); the effect of induction or the production of an electric current in a neutral body by approaching it to one already electrified, but without contact; the degree of induction, as determined by the nature of the non-conductor or dielectric (see induction, conductor, dielectric); the accumulation of electricity in a condenser, as a Leyden jar (see condenser, and Leyden jar, under jar); the measurement of capacity, potential, quantity, etc. (as with an electrometer); and the phenomena of discharge, as the spark-discharge, which takes place between oppositely electrified bodies when they are brought near together, the brush-discharge, etc. The electricity generated by friction and analogous means is in a state of high potential (see potential), but the quantity, and therefore the amount of electrical energy, is generally small; it has the power of overcoming great resistances and producing violent mechanical effects, as seen in the discharge of a Holtz machine, and still more strikingly in the case of lightning. Frictional electricity has found but few useful applications in the arts. The common means of producing current electricity is the voltaic battery (see battery and cell). Electrical currents may also be obtained by revolving a coil of wire in the space (magnetic field) between the poles of a steel magnet or electromagnet, so as to cut the lines of force between these poles. This principle is made use of in magneto-electric and dynamo-electric machines (see electric) to obtain powerful currents of electricity for practical use. A current may also be produced by soldering together two ends of two bars of different metals, connecting the other ends with a copper wire, and then heating (or cooling) the first point of union. This is called thermo-electricity, and the pair of metals is called a thermo-electric couple; it is analogous to the voltaic couple, only here the electrical current is obtained at the expense of the heat supplied. (See thermo-electricity.) The principal subjects considered under the head of current electricity are the effects of the current in causing chemical decomposition (see electrolysis, electrometallurgy), in producing heat and light through the resistance of the medium, including the voltaic arc, and in the production of induced currents in a coil of wire, under certain conditions, by the action of another current or a magnet (see induction); the measurement of strength of current (as with a galvanometer or ampere-meter, which see), of electromotive force (as with a volt-meter), and of resistance (as with the electric bridge or ohm-meter), etc. The current electricity produced by the chemical battery or ordinary dynamo-machine differs from the static electricity of the frictional or induction machine, in that the difference of potentials of the poles, or, in other words, the electromotive force of the current when the poles are connected, is relatively small, while the quantity of electricity is relatively enormously large. Correspondingly, ordinary current electricity has relatively very little power of overcoming a high resistance; no spark is obtained, even from a powerful battery, when the poles are separated by so much as a small fraction of an inch; but the current can do a large amount of work in producing chemical decomposition (as in the electrolysis of water), or mechanical work, when transformed by an electric motor. Induced currents, however, as those produced by an induction-coil (which see), may have a very high electromotive force and consequent power of overcoming resistance.—Animal electricity. See animal.—Contact theory of electricity, a theory which assumes that the electromotive force of a voltaic cell, and perhaps the electricity produced by friction, is due to the difference of potential assumed by the two dissimilar substances when placed in contact.—Diffusion of electricity. See diffusion.—Distribution of electricity. See distribution.—Electrostatic units of electricity. See electrostatic.—Excitation of electricity. See excitation.—Free and bound electricity. By a "free" charge of electricity is generally meant one which is borne by an insulated body independently of surrounding objects, while a "bound" charge is one held in position by the presence and attraction of a charge of the opposite character or sign upon a neighboring body. As a matter of fact, the bound charge is not a bound charge of a given quantity of one kind of electricity being always accompanied by the production of the same quantity of the opposite kind. When this complementary charge is very distant and widely distributed, as on the walls of a room, the first may be said to be "free" electricity.

electriferous (ē-lek'trif'e-rus), a. [< LL. electrifer, producing amber (bearing electricity) (< L. electrum, amber (repr. electricity), + ferre = E. bear), + -ous.] Bearing or transmitting electricity. Also electrophorous.

A distinct, all-pervading electriferous ether must be assumed. Littell's Living Age, March 1, 1884, p. 522.

electrifiable (ē-lek'tri-fi-a-bl), a. [< electrify + -able.] 1. Capable of receiving electricity, or of being charged with it; that may be electrified or become electric.—2. Capable of receiving and transmitting the electric fluid.

electrification (ē-lek'tri-fi-kā'shon), n. [< electrify + -ation.] The act of electrifying, or the state of being charged with electricity. This may be positive (+) or negative (−), according as the body is charged with positive or negative electricity—that is, according as its potential is higher or lower than the assumed zero. See potential.

If an electrified body be made to touch one not previously electrified, it is found that the one loses a part of its electrification and the other gains electrification.

J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., I, 4.

electrifier (ē-lek'tri-fi-ēr), n. One who or that which electrifies.

electrify (ē-lek'tri-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. electrified, ppr. electrifying. [< L. electrum, amber (repr. electricity), + -ficare, make: see -fy.] 1. To communicate electricity to; charge with electricity; make electric: as, to electrify a jar.—2. To cause electricity to pass through; affect by electricity; give an electric shock to: as, to electrify a limb.—3. To excite suddenly; give a sudden shock to; surprise with some sudden and startling effect, of a brilliant or shocking nature; startle greatly; thrill: as, the whole assembly was electrified.

He [Milton] electrifies the mind. Macaulay, Milton.

If the sovereign were now to impute a subject in defiance of the writ of Habeas Corpus, or to put a conspirator to the torture, the whole nation would be instantly electrified by the news. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., I.

electrine¹ (ē-lek'trin), a. [< LL. electrinus, < Gr. ἤλεκτρον, made of amber or electrum, < ἤλεκτρον, amber, electrum: see electrum.] 1. Belonging to or made of amber.—2. Composed of the alloy called electrum (which see).

electrine² (ē-lek'trin), n. [< electrum (electric) + *-ine*².] The (supposed) principle of electricity; a (supposed) kind of matter which manifests electrical phenomena.

A hitherto undescribed ponderable chemical element, which he terms electrine, and which he assumes to be an essential constituent of oxygen.

Ashburner, in Reichenbach's Dynamics, Pref., p. xiv.

electrization (ē-lek'tri-zā'shon), n. [= F. électrisation = Sp. electrización = Pg. electrização; as electrize + -ation.] The act of electrifying. Also spelled electrisation.

It is not electricity which cures, but Electrizations, a process requiring far more technical skill than the uninitiated generally believe. Allen and Neurol., VI, 153.

electrize (ē-lek'triz), v. t.; pret. and pp. electrized, ppr. electrizing. [= D. elektriseren = G. elektrisieren = Dan. elektrisere = Sw. elektrisera = F. électriser = Sp. Pg. electrizar = It. elettrizzare, < *NL. electrizare, electric, < L. electrum, amber (repr. electricity).] To make electric; electrify. Also spelled electrise.

electrizer (ē-lek'tri-zēr), n. One who or that which electrifies; specifically, an apparatus for the application of electricity for medical purposes. Also spelled electriser.

electro (ē-lek'trō), n. [Abbreviation of electrotype.] An electrotype.

For these reasons the Act is objectionable in prohibiting the importation of stereotypes and electros. Amer. Publishers' Circular.

electro- [NL., etc., electro-, formally repr. Gr. ἤλεκτρο-, combining form of ἤλεκτρον, amber, electrum (see electrum), but practically a contraction of electrico-, combining form of electricus, E. electric: see electric.] The combining form, in many modern compounds, of electric, often representing also electricity. [In the following compounds containing electro-, where the second element exists independently in English, or is otherwise perfectly obvious, and where no parallel forms are cited, no etymology is given.]

electroballistic (ē-lek'trō-ba-lis'tik), a. Concerned with electricity as used to determine the velocity of a projectile at any part of its flight: an epithet applied to various instruments invented by Navez. The projectile passes in succession through two or more screens, the distance between which are known; and the exact time of passage through each screen being electrically recorded, a simple calculation gives the velocity at that part of the flight.

electrobath (ē-lek'trō-bāth), n. The liquid used in electroplating, in which the metal to be deposited is held in solution.

electrobiological (ē-lek'trō-bi-ō-loj'i-kal), a. Of or pertaining to electrobiology.

electrobiologist (ē-lek'trō-bi-ō-l'ō-jist), n. One versed in electrobiology.

electrobiology (ē-lek'trō-bi-ō-l'ō-ji), n. 1. Biology as concerned with electrical phenomena; that branch of science which treats of the electric currents developed in living organisms.—2. That phase of mesmerism or animal magnetism in which the actions, feelings, etc., of a person in the mesmeric condition are controlled, or supposed to be controlled, by the will of the operator.

electrobioscopy (ē-lek'trō-bi-ōs'kō-pi), n. The process of testing the muscles with electricity to determine if life is extinct. Greer, Dict. of Electricity, p. 49.

electrobronze (ē-lek'trō-bronz), n. A metallic coat given to iron articles by an electro-bath. The coating is subsequently protected by a varnish.

electrocapillarity (ē-lek'trō-kap-i-lar'i-ti), n. Certain phenomena collectively occurring at the common surface of two liquids in contact when their difference of potential is altered. The surface-tension of the liquids is changed, and motion usually results. See electrocapillary.

electrocapillary (ē-lek'trō-kap'i-lā-ri), a. Capillary and electrical: designating certain capillary phenomena produced by electricity. For example, if a horizontal glass tube be filled with a dilute acid, and a drop of mercury be placed in the middle of the tube, the passage of a current of electricity through it will cause the drop to move toward the negative pole. A capillary electrometer has been constructed, in which the pressure of a column of liquid is made to balance the electrocapillary force exerted at the surface of contact of mercury and dilute acid, this force being nearly proportional to the electromotive force when it does not exceed one volt.

electrocautery (ē-lek'trō-kā'tēr-i), n. In surg., cauterizing by means of a platinum wire heated by the passage of a current of electricity; the instrument used.

electrochemical (ē-lek'trō-kem'i-kal), a. Pertaining to electrochemistry.

The electromotive force of an electrolyte is equal to the mechanical equivalent of the heat of combination of its electrochemical equivalent.

Atkinson, tr. of Mascart and Joubert, I. 247.

Electrochemical series, the arrangement of the chemical elements in such an order that all the elements which are electropositive with reference to a given element are placed before it, and all those which are electronegative after it. See electrolysis.

electrochemically (ē-lek'trō-kem'i-kal-i), adv. According to the laws of electrochemistry.

The electro-chemically equivalent amount of copper sulphate. Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 8814.

electrochemist (ē-lek'trō-kem'ist), n. One who practises electrochemistry.

It [electrometallurgy] is a subject of intense interest to the chemist and to the electrician, for it combines principles underlying its practice which belong to both professions. In fact, the man skilled in its science and art may appropriately be styled an electro-chemist.

Jour. Franklin Inst., CXIX, 81.

electrochemistry (ē-lek'trō-kem'is-tri), n. Chemistry as concerned with electricity; the science which treats of the agency of electricity in effecting chemical changes. It is generally divided into electrolysis, or the separation of a compound body into its constituent parts by the passage of an electric current, and electrometallurgy, or the application of electrolysis to the arts. See electrolysis.

electrochronograph (ē-lek'trō-kron'ō-grāf), n. A chronograph on which the record is made by electrical means: much used in astronomical observatories and in the laboratory for noting the precise instant or duration of transits and similar phenomena. See chronograph.

electrochronographic (ē-lek'trō-kron'ō-grāf'ik), a. Pertaining to an electrochronograph, or indicated and recorded by means of it.

electrocopper (ē-lek'trō-kop'ēr), v. t. To plate or cover with copper by means of electricity. See electroplating.

Steel, iron, zinc, lead, and tin which have been previously electro-coppered. Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 212.

electrode (ē-lek'trōd), n. [= F. electrode; as electric + Gr. ὁδός, way.] A pole of the current from an electric battery or machine which is in use in effecting electrolysis: applied generally to the two ends of an open electric circuit. The positive pole is termed the anode, and the negative pole the cathode.

electrodeposit (ē-lek'trō-dē-poz'it), n. That which has been deposited by means of electricity.

electrodeposit (ē-lek'trō-dē-poz'it), v. t. To deposit, as a metal or other substance, from a chemical compound, by means of electricity.

In the same year also M. de Ruolz electro-deposited brass from a solution composed of the cyanides of copper and zinc dissolved in aqueous cyanides of potassium. G. Gore, Electro-Metallurgy, p. 25.

electrodeposition (ē-lek'trō-dē-pō-zish'on), n. The deposition of metals or other substances from a solvent by means of electricity.

Employed electro-deposition for producing the copper plates. G. Gore, Electro-Metallurgy, p. 25.

electrodepositor (ē-lek'trō-dē-poz'it-tor), n. One who practises the art of electrodeposition.

In 1840, M. de Ruolz, a French electro-depositor, . . . had taken out a patent in France for electro-gilding.

W. H. Wahl, Galvanoplastic Manipulations, p. 20.

electrodiapason (ē-lek'trō-dī-a-pā-zon), n. Same as electrical diapason (which see, under electrical).

A universal support or electro-diapason, intended to inscribe and show in projection the vibratory movements. Jour. Franklin Inst., CXXI, Supp., p. 43.

electrodynamical, electrodynamic (ē-lek'trō-dī-nam'ik, -i-kal), a. Pertaining to electro-dynamics.—Directrix of electrodynamic action. See directrix.

electrodynamics (ē-lek'trō-dī-nam'iks), n. That part of the science of electricity which treats of the mutual action of electric currents and of currents and magnets.

electrodynamism (ē-lek'trō-dī-nā-mizm), n. See the extract.

The trance caused by regarding fixedly a gleaming point produces in the brain, in his [Dr. Phillips's] opinion, an accumulation of a peculiar nervous power, which he calls electrodynamism. Science, IX, 542.

electrodynamometer (ē-lek'trō-dī-nā-mom'e-ter), n. [= electrodynamometer + L. metrum, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the strength of an electric current by means of the attraction or repulsion mutually exerted by two coils of wire, through at least one of which the whole or a part of the current to be measured passes.

Weber devised an instrument known as an electrodynamometer for measuring the strength of currents by means of the electrodynamic action of one part of the circuit upon another part. S. P. Thompson, Elect. and Mag., p. 297.

electrodynamometrical (ē-lek'trō-dī-nā-mō-met'ri-kal), a. Pertaining to the electro-dynamometer.

Electro-dynamometrical measurements.

Electrical Rev., XXII, 159.

electro-engraving (ē-lek'trō-en-grā'ving), n. An etching process in which the plate, covered with a ground and properly etched, is placed in an electrobath to deepen the "bite" or cutting-in of the lines.

electro-ergometer (ē-lek'trō-ēr-gom'e-ter), n. See ergometer.

electrogenesis (ē-lek'trō-jen'e-sis), n. Causation or production by electricity.

electrogenetic (ē-lek'trō-jē-net'ik), a. Of or pertaining to electrogenesis.

electrogild (ē-lek'trō-gil'd), v. t.; pret. and pp. electrogilded, electrogilt, prp. electrogilding. To gild, by means of the voltaic battery, with a thin deposit of gold precipitated from a bath of a salt of the metal.

electrogilder (ē-lek'trō-gil'dēr), n. One who practises electrogilding.

electrograph (ē-lek'trō-grāf), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity; see electric, electro-), + γραφειν, write.] 1. A curve automatically traced and forming a continuous record of the indications of an electrometer.—2. An apparatus for engraving the copper cylinders used in printing fabrics and wall-papers. The cylinder is first coated with varnish, which is scratched by diamond-points traversing upon it, and controlled by circuit-breakers, that are in turn controlled by the copyist. The exposed portions are then etched by exposure to an acid bath.

electrography (ē-lek'trō-grā-fi), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + -γραφία, < γραφειν, write.] 1. Galvanography. Specifically.—2. The process of copying a fine engraving on copper or steel by means of an electro-copper deposit.

electrokinetic (ē-lek'trō-ki-net'ik), a. Of or pertaining to electrokinetics, or electricity in motion.

electrokinetics (ē-lek'trō-ki-net'iks), n. That branch of electricity which treats of electric currents, or the flow of electricity.

electrolier (ē-lek'trō-lēr'), n. [Modern, formed in imitation of chandelier.] A bracket, pen-dant, or stand, often with branches, and ornamented, used for supporting incandescent electric lamps.

electrolithotripsy (ē-lek'trō-li-thot'ri-ti), n. Lithotripsy, or the destruction of vesical calculi, effected by electrolysis.

electrologic, electrological (ē-lek'trō-loj'ik, -i-kal), a. [electrology + -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to electrology.

electrologist (ē-lek'trō-lō-jist), n. One versed in the science of electrology.

electrology (ē-lek'trō-lō-ji), n. [= F. electrologie; < Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] The department of physical science which treats of the phenomena and properties of electricity.

electrolysability, electrolysable, etc. See electrolyzability, etc.

electrolysis (ē-lek'trō-lī-sis), n. [= F. électrolyse, < *NL. electrolysis, < Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + λύσις, solution, resolution, < λύνω, loose, solve, resolve. Cf. analysis.] The decomposition of a chemical compound, called the electrolyte, into its constituent parts by an electric current.

Thus, water is decomposed by electrolysis into hydrogen and oxygen; of these it is found that the hydrogen is attracted by the negative pole (the cathode), and is hence said to be electropositive, and is called the cation; while the oxygen collects at the positive pole (the anode), and is said to be electronegative, and is called the anion. Similarly, by experimenting with different compounds and observing the behavior in each case, an electrochemical series of the elements, arranged in order, from oxygen, the most negative, to the most positive metals, sodium, potassium, etc., has been deduced. A salt may also be decomposed by electrolysis: thus, copper sulphate yields metallic copper at the negative pole (upon which it is deposited), and sulphuric acid at the positive pole. By electrolysis Davy was able to decompose lime and the other alkaline earths, and thus to show that they were compounds of metals, calcium, etc., with oxygen. An electrolysis in which the ions (a term including both anion and cation) are produced at their respective electrodes without interference from these electrodes or the surrounding electrolyte is called a primary electrolysis. Very often combinations take place between the ions and the electrodes or the electrolyte, so that the final products are different from the true ions. This is called secondary electrolysis. For the application of electrolysis in the arts, see electrometallurgy.

electrolyte (ē-lek'trō-līt), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + λύσις, verbal n. of λύνω, solve, dissolve. Cf. electrolysis.] A compound which is decomposable, or is subjected to decomposition, by an electric current.

No elementary substance can be an electrolyte: for from the nature of the operation compounds alone are susceptible of electrolysis. W. A. Miller, Elem. of Chem., § 282.

electrolytic, electrolytical (ē-lek'trō-līt'ik, -i-kal), a. [= F. électrolytique; as electrolyte + -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to or of the nature of electrolysis.

It is not improbable that the increased electrolytic power of water by the addition of some acids, such as the sulphuric and phosphoric, where the acids themselves are not decomposed, depends upon a catalytic effect of these acids. W. R. Grove, Corr. of Forces, p. 169.

Electrolytic cell. See cell.

electrolytically (ē-lek'trō-līt'ik-al-i), adv. In an electrolytic manner; by means of electrolysis; as in electrolysis.

The fibre is carbonized in moulds of nickel, and is attached to the conducting wires by copper, electrolytically deposited upon them. G. B. Prescott, Dynam. Elect., p. 283.

electrolyzability (ē-lek'trō-lī-zā-bil'i-ti), n. The capability of being decomposed by an electric current. Also spelled electrolysisability.

electrolyzable (ē-lek'trō-lī-zā-bl), a. [= F. électrolyisable; as electrolyze + -able.] Susceptible of decomposition by an electric current. Also spelled electrolysisable.

electrolyzation (ē-lek'trō-lī-zā-shon), n. [= F. électrolystation; as electrolyze + -ation.] The act of electrolyzing. Also spelled electrolystation.

electrolyze (ē-lek'trō-lī-zē), v. t.; pret. and pp. electrolyzed, prp. electrolyzing. [= F. électrolyser; < electrolysis. Cf. analyze, < analysis.] To decompose by the direct action of electricity. Also spelled electrolyse.

electromagnet (ē-lek'trō-mag'net), n. A magnet which owes its magnetic properties to the inductive action of an electric current. If an insulated wire is wound about a bar of soft iron and a current of electricity is passed through it, the bar becomes a temporary magnet with a north and a south pole; the end at which the current circulates through the wire in the direction of the hands of a clock, as the observer looks at it, is the south pole. In practice, an electromagnet has ordinarily a horseshoe form. It consists of two cylinders, or cores, of soft iron, fastened together at one end and each wound many times with insulated wire; the wire must be so wound that if the horseshoe were straightened the direction of winding would be the same throughout. An electromagnet may be made very powerful, so as to support a ton or more. The soft iron core retains its maximum magnetization only so long as the current is passing, and loses nearly all of it the instant the current ceases. This principle is made use of in the telegraph (which see), electric clocks, electric call-bells, etc. If the core is made of steel, it becomes under the action of the current a permanent magnet.

electromagnetic (ē-lek'trō-mag-net'ik), a. Pertaining to electromagnetics, or to the relation between electricity and magnetism; of the nature of electromagnetism. See electromagnetism. Also galvanomagnetic.—Electromagnetic engine, machine. See electric machine, under electric.—Electromagnetic theory of light. See light.—Electromagnetic units, units employed in measuring electric currents, and based upon the force exerted between two magnetic poles; the units practically used to measure the strength of currents (ampere), electromotive force (volt), resistance (ohm), etc., are electromagnetic units.

electromagnetically (ē-lek'trō-mag-net'ik-ly), adv. In an electromagnetic manner; by electromagnetism.

A single wire bent twice at right-angles is made to rotate electromagnetically between the poles of a horseshoe magnet. Dredge's Electric Illumination, I. 74.

electromagnetics (ē-lek'trō-mag-net'iks), n. The science of electromagnetism.

electromagnetism (ē-lek'trō-mag-net'izm), n. The collective term for the phenomena which rest upon the relation between electric currents and magnetism. It comprises the effects of an electric current in directing a magnetic needle and in inducing magnetism in a magnetic substance, as soft iron, and also the analogous effects of a magnet in directing a movable conductor traversed by a current, or in inducing in a conductor an electric current. The directive power of an electric current upon a magnet was discovered by Oersted; it is the principle involved in all forms of galvanometer (which see). The power of an electric current to induce magnetism, and of a magnet to induce an electric current, is treated under induction; these latter phenomena form the basis of the electromagnet and of all forms of magneto-electric and dynamo-electric machines.

electromagnetist (ē-lek'trō-mag-net'ist), n. One skilled in electromagnetism.

electromassage (ē-lek'trō-ma-sāzh'), n. In therap., the combination of the use of electricity with massage by employing the more or less specially modified electrodes of a galvanic or faradic battery as instruments for more or less imperfect rubbing and kneading.

electromedical (ē-lek'trō-med'ik-al), a. Pertaining to the medicinal use of electricity.

electrometallurgy (ē-lek'trō-met'al-er-jī), n. The art of depositing certain metals, as gold, silver, copper, etc., from their solutions by means of the slow action of an electric current. Its most important applications are electroplating and electrolytizing. The essential parts of the process of plating with copper, for example, are as follows: If the surface upon which the metal is to be deposited is a mold (as of a medal) of gutta-percha or wax, it must be made a conductor by having its surface brushed over with powdered graphite. It is then attached to the negative pole of the battery and suspended in the solution of the required metal, as copper sulphate, the positive pole at the same time consisting of a plate of the same metal. The result of the electrolysis (see electrolysis) caused by the passage of the current is the decomposition of the solution, the metal being deposited upon the exposed surface at the negative pole, and sulphuric acid being formed at the positive pole; the acid, however, dissolves a part of the copperplate, and thus keeps the solution of constant strength. A current of uniform strength is necessary. Iron and nickel are deposited from solutions of their double salts with ammonium; gold and silver, from alkaline solutions containing potassium cyanide.

electrometer (ē-lek'trō-mē'tēr), n. [= D. G. Dan. Sw. elektrometer = F. électromètre = Sp. electrómetro = Pg. electrometro = It. eletmetro, < Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring difference of electrostatic potential between two conductors. See potential. There are many forms. The absolute electrometer (also called balance-electrometer) of Sir William Thomson consists essentially of two parallel circular plates attracting each other, the central portion of one of them, the upper, suspended from one arm of a balance or by means of light steel springs, the other being movable to a greater or less distance from the first by means of a micrometer screw. The upper disk is always brought to a fixed position (which can be very accurately determined) by means of the attraction of the lower, the amount of attraction being regulated by the distance between the two plates. It is thus seen that the electric force is actually weighed, and formulas are given by means of which the difference of potentials is deducible in absolute measure, the areas of the plates and the distance between them being known. The quadrant electrometer of Sir William Thomson consists of four quadrant-shaped pieces of metal, sometimes segments of a flat cylindrical box, the alternate pairs being connected by a wire; above or within this, if the cylindrical form is used, a flat needle of aluminum is hung by a delicate wire. The needle is kept in a constant electrical condition by connection usually with a Leyden jar placed above or below, and if the two pairs of quadrants are dissimilarly electrified—that is, are in a state of different potential, as by connecting them respectively with the poles of a voltaic cell—the needle is deflected from its position of rest, and the amount of this deflection, as measured by the motion of a spot of light reflected from a small mirror attached to it, gives a means of calculating the difference of potential of the bodies under experiment. In another method of using the quadrant electrometer the pairs of quadrants are kept at a constant difference of potential, while that of the needle varies. Arranged in this manner, it is much used in the investigation of atmospheric electricity. Lippmann and Dewar have devised very delicate capillary electrometers, based on the alteration of the force of capillarity by electric action. See electrocapillary.

electrometric, electrometrical (ē-lek'trō-mē'trik, -ri-kal), a. [As electrometer + -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to electrometry, or the measurement of electricity: as, an electrometrical experiment.

electrometry (ē-lek'trō-mē'trī), n. [As electrometer + -y.] That department of the science of electricity which embraces the methods of making electrical measurements, more especially of static electricity.

electromotion (ē-lek'trō-mō'shon), n. 1. The current of electricity, or the passing of it from one metal to another, in a voltaic circuit.—2. Mechanical motion produced by means of electricity.

electromotive (ē-lek'trō-mō'tiv), a. Of or pertaining to electromotion; producing or produced by electromotion.—Electromotive force (abbreviated E. M. F.), that which causes the flow of electricity from one place to another, giving rise to an electric current. It is the result of, and proportional to, the difference of electric potential (see potential) between two bodies, or parts of the same body, and bears a similar relation to it that the pressure in a water-pipe does to the difference of water-level upon which its amount depends. The strength of an electric current is directly proportional to the electromotive force, and inversely proportional to the resistance (Ohm's law). The electromotive force is measured in volts.—Electromotive series, the series of the various metals (or other substances) useful for producing an electric current, arranged in such an order for a given liquid that each is positive with reference to those which follow in the list, and negative for those which precede. For example, in dilute sulphuric acid the order is zinc, lead, iron, copper, silver, platinum, carbon—that is, if zinc and iron are coupled together in a voltaic cell containing sulphuric acid, the zinc is the positive plate, and the current goes in the wire from iron to zinc; if iron and copper are taken, the current in the wire is from copper to iron. It is found that the electromotive force is a maximum for zinc and carbon, and is equal to the sum of the electromotive forces for all the intervening metals. In another liquid the order would be changed, but the above law would hold true; for example, in potassium sulphid, iron is electro-negative with reference to copper. Also called contact series.

electrometograph (ē-lek'trō-mō'tō-grāf), n. A name sometimes applied to a peculiar telephone-receiver invented by Edison. The vibrations of the mica disk by which the sound is reproduced are caused by variations in frictional resistance between a revolving cylinder of lime and a small platinum plate which rests upon its surface and is attached to the center of the disk, these variations being due to variations in the strength of the current transmitted.

electromotor (ē-lek'trō-mō'tor), n. [= F. électromoteur = Sp. electromotor; < L. electricum, amber (repr. electricity), + motor, a mover.] 1. Any arrangement which gives rise to an electric current, as a single cell, a voltaic battery, or a thermo-electric pile.—2. An engine in which electricity is employed to produce mechanical effects. See electric machine, under electric, and motor.

electromuscular (ē-lek'trō-mus'kü-lār), a. Pertaining to the relations between electricity and certain phenomena exhibited by muscles.

electron (ē-lek'trōn), n. Same as electron.

electronegative (ē-lek'trō-neg'a-tiv), a. and n. 1. Repelled by bodies negatively electrified; and attracted by those positively electrified; having a tendency to pass to the positive pole in electrolysis.—2. Assuming negative potential when in contact with a dissimilar substance, as copper when joined to zinc in a voltaic cell. See electromotive series, under electromotive.

II. n. A body which, in the process of electrolysis, appears at the positive pole of the voltaic battery. Oxygen is the most electronegative of the elements. See electrolysis.
Electronegatively (ē-lek'trō-neg'a-tiv-ly), adv. In an electronegative manner.

Such materials as are related electro-negatively to iron. Sci. Amer., N. S., LIV. 324.

electro-optic (ē-lek'trō-op'tik), a. Of or pertaining to electro-optics: as, an electro-optic action.

electro-optics (ē-lek'trō-op'tiks), n. That branch of the science of electricity which treats of its relations to light. Among these relations are: the production of double refraction, as in glass, by the electrostatic stress produced when two wires from an induction coil or Holtz machine are fixed in holes in it near together; the rotation of the plane of polarization of a ray of light on traversing a transparent medium placed in a magnetic field, or by reflection at the surface of a magnet; the change of electrical resistance exhibited by certain bodies during exposure to light, as selenium (see photoconductor); and the relation between the index of refraction and the specific inductive capacity of transparent bodies which is established by experiment and required by the electromagnetic theory of light.

electropathic (ē-lek'trō-path'ik), a. [< electropathy + -ic.] Pertaining to electropathy. Science, XI, No. 274, adv. p. iii.

electropathy (ē-lek'trō-p'ā-thī), n. [< Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + πάθος, < πάρος, suffering. Cf. homeopathy.] Treatment of disease by electricity; electrotherapeutics.

electrophone (ē-lek'trō-fōn), n. [< Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + φωνή, voice, sound.] An instrument for producing sounds, resembling trumpet-tones, by electric currents of high tension. It has been recommended for use as a telegraphic relay capable of giving two or four signs with a single wire, having this advantage over other relays, that perfection of contact is not necessary to its working. It has been used also to indicate the electric equilibrium of muscle and nervous tissue by the variation of its tones, and by a system of levers attached to the wrist to show the rhythm and character of the pulse; and it may be fitted to the telephone, and thus be made to repeat a sound made gently in one place in trumpet-tones in another place hundreds of yards distant. Chambers's Encyc.

electrophori, n. Plural of electrophorus, 1.

electrophorid (ē-lek'trōf'ō-rid), n. A fish of the family Electrophoridae.

Electrophoridæ (ē-lek'trō-for'id-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Electrophorus + -idæ.] A family of anguilliform fishes, of the order Plecostomydii. There are no scales nor dorsal fin; the head is rounded in front, the premaxillaries forming most of the upper border of the mouth, and the supramaxillaries being reduced; and the anus is under the throat, the anal fin beginning just behind it, and continuous with the caudal. The family contains the electric eel (which see, under eel). See also Gymnotidae.

electrophoroid (ē-lek'trōf'ō-roid), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Electrophoridae.

II. n. One of the Electrophoridae.

electrophorous (ē-lek'trōf'ō-rus), a. [< NL. electrophorus: see electrophorus.] Same as electriferous.

electrophorus (ē-lek'trōf'ō-rus), n. [= F. électrophore = Sp. electróforo, < NL. electrophorus, < Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + φορέω, < φέρω = E. bear.] 1. Pl. electrophori (-ri). An instrument for obtaining static electricity by means of induction. It consists of a disk of resin, or other non-conducting material easily excited by friction, and a polished metal disk with an insulating handle. The resin disk is negatively electrified by striking or rubbing it with a cat's skin or flannel, and the metal plate is then laid upon it. Under these circumstances the upper plate does not receive a direct charge from the lower, but is positively charged on the lower surface and negatively on the upper; if now the disk is touched by the finger, the negative electricity passes to the ground, leaving the disk charged positively. On being lifted away by its insulating handle, it is found to be charged, and will give a spark. It may then be replaced on the lower plate, and the process repeated an indefinite number of times without any fresh excitation, if the weather is favorable. The electricity obtained each time is the equivalent of the mechanical work done in separating the two surfaces against the attraction of the unlike electricities.

2. [cap.] [NL.] The typical genus of Electrophoridae. There is but one species, the electric eel, E. electricus. Gill, 1864. See cut under eel.

electrophotometer (ē-lek'trō-fō-tōm'e-tēr), n. An instrument for comparing the intensities of various lights by reference to the intensity of the light produced by an electric spark. See photometer.

electrophotomicrography (ē-lek'trō-fō'tō-mi-krog'g-rā-fī), n. The art of photographing, by means of the electric light, objects as magnified by the microscope. E. H. Knight.

electrophysiological (ē-lek'trō-fiz'i-ō-lōj'ik-al), a. Relating to electrical results produced in living tissues.

electrophysiologist (ē-lek'trō-fiz-i-ō-lōj'ist), n. One who is versed in electrophysiology.

electrophysiology (ē-lek'trō-fiz-i-ō-lōj'ī), n. That branch of science which treats of electric phenomena produced through physiological agencies.

Volta's Electrophorus.

electroplate (ē-lek'trō-plāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. electroplated, ppr. electroplating. To plate or give a coating of silver or other metal to by means of electrolysis. See electrometallurgy.

To electroplate is to disguise with an adherent thin coating of metal, which then serves as an ornamental covering to the object treated. To electrotype, on the other hand, is to produce a separate and distinct object, with an existence of its own. J. W. Urquhart, Electrotyping, p. 4.

electroplate (ē-lek'trō-plāt), n. Articles coated with silver or other metal by the process of electroplating.

electroplater (ē-lek'trō-plā-tēr), n. One who practises electroplating.

electroplating (ē-lek'trō-plā-ting), n. 1. The process or art of coating metals and other materials with an adherent film of metal, in a bath containing a solution of the metal, by means of the electrolytic action of an electric current from a battery or dynamo. In simple forms of electroplating apparatus, the bath containing the metallic solution may form the battery, as in plating with copper. The more common plan is to employ a current obtained from some source outside the bath. Table-cutlery or ware, building- or car-fixtures, lamps, etc., to be electroplated, are suspended by wires from a metal rod laid across the top of the bath and connected with the negative pole of the battery, this terminal of the current forming the cathode. The silver, nickel, copper, etc., to be deposited is suspended in like manner from a rod connected with the positive pole of the battery, the terminal forming the anode. (See electrolysis, electrometallurgy.) The deposition of metals by electrolysis forms a part of several arts, as in electrotyping; but as in these the film of metal deposited in the bath is not adherent, they are described under separate heads. Electroplating is strictly the covering of a metal with a metallic film permanently attached to it, as in nickel-plating, plating telegraph-wires with copper, and table-ware with silver. See electrotype, galvanoplastic, galvanograph, galvanograph, and nickel-plating. 2. The deposit itself, or the surface, obtained by means of the process explained above.

electropoison (ē-lek'trō-poi'zon), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + ποιεῖν, pp. of ποιέω, make.] A mixture of sulphuric acid, bichromate of potash, and water, used as the liquid for batteries in which zinc and carbon are the poles.

electropolar (ē-lek'trō-pō'lār), a. Having, as an electrical conductor, one end or surface positive and the other negative.

electropositive (ē-lek'trō-poz'i-tiv), a. and n. 1. a. Attracted by bodies negatively electrified, or by the negative pole of a voltaic battery.—2. Assuming positive potential when in contact with another substance, as zinc in a voltaic cell.

II. n. A body which in electrolysis appears at the negative pole of a voltaic battery. Potassium is the most electropositive of all known bodies. See electrolysis.

electropuncture, electropuncture (ē-lek'trō-pungk-tūr-rā'shon, ē-lek'trō-pungk'tūr), n. Same as electropuncturing.

electropuncturing (ē-lek'trō-pungk'tūr-ing), n. In med., the operation of inserting two or more needles in a part affected and then connecting them with the wires from the poles of a galvanic battery.

electrothermometer (ē-lek'trō-thēr-mō-mē-tēr), n. See pyrometer.

electroscope (ē-lek'trō-skōp), n. [= D. elektroskop = G. Dan. elektroskop = F. électroscope = Sp. electróscoipo = Pg. electróscoipo = It. elettróscopio, < NL. electroscopium*, < Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument for observing or detecting the existence of free electricity, and, in general, for determining its kind. All electroscopes depend for their action on the elementary law of electric forces, that bodies similarly charged repel each other, while bodies dissimilarly charged attract each other. The simplest electroscopes consist of pith-balls suspended by silk threads; another simple form consists of a pair of short pieces of straw suspended by silk threads. When not in use the pieces of straw hang down, touching each other. On presenting an electrified body to them they become excited and stand apart, thus giving a test for electricity. The gold-leaf electroscope of Bennet, introduced in 1789, consists of two pieces of gold-leaf, about 1/4 inch broad, fixed to a brass rod and hung inside a glass globe which has been thoroughly dried, in order that the insulation of the apparatus may be as nearly perfect as possible. The globe is closed with a wooden stopper, through the center of which passes a glass tube containing the brass rod. The upper end of the rod is furnished with a knob. If an electrified body is brought near the top of the instrument, induction takes place; the top becomes electrified oppositely to the body presented, and the pieces of gold-leaf similarly. To find if the latter are positively or negatively charged, a glass rod is rubbed and brought near the knob; if positively charged, the leaves will diverge still more under the induction of the glass; if negatively, they will collapse, the negative electricity being attracted to the positive of the glass rod. In Volta's condensing electroscope, in place of the gilt knob there is a flat metal plate upon which rests another similar plate, which may be removed by an insulating handle.—Quadrant electroscope, a form of pith-ball electroscope which serves to measure roughly the degree of electrification by the rise of the pith-ball as indicated by the motion of the rod carrying it on a graduated semicircle.

electroscopic (ē-lek'trō-skōp'ik), a. Of or pertaining to the electroscope; performed by means of the electroscope.

electrosemaphore (ē-lek'trō-sem'a-fōr), n. A semaphore operated by electricity.

electrostatic, electrostatical (ē-lek'trō-stat'ik, -i-kal), a. Pertaining to static electricity.

—Electrostatic units of electricity, those units which are based upon the force exerted between two quantities of static electricity, as units of quantity, potential, etc.

electrostatics (ē-lek'trō-stat'iks), n. The science which treats of the phenomena of static electricity (see electricity), as the mutual attractions or repulsions of electrified bodies, the measurement and distribution of charges of electricity, etc.

That branch of electrical science which treats of the properties of simple electrified bodies is called electrostatics, because in them the electricity is supposed to be at rest. J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., I. 23.

electrosteeling (ē-lek'trō-stē'ling), n. The art of electroplating with iron the copperplates used in engraving. See electroplating.

electrostereotype (ē-lek'trō-ster'ē-ō-tīp), n. Same as electrotype.

electrotechnic, electrotechnical (ē-lek'trō-tek'nik, -ni-kal), a. Of or pertaining to electrotechnics.

electrotechnics (ē-lek'trō-tek'niks), n. The methods, processes, and operations made use of in the application of electricity to the arts.

electrotherapeutic (ē-lek'trō-thēr-a-pū'tik), a. Of or pertaining to electrotherapeutics.

electrotherapeutics (ē-lek'trō-thēr-a-pū'tiks), n. The treatment of disease by means of electricity; the principles and doctrines of such treatment as a branch of medicine; electrophathy.

electrotherapist (ē-lek'trō-thēr-a-pū'tist), n. One who studies or practises electrotherapeutics.

electrotherapy (ē-lek'trō-thēr-a-pi), n. Same as electrotherapeutics.

electrothermancy (ē-lek'trō-thēr'man-si), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + θερμανεῖν, a heating, < θερμαίνω, heat, < θερμός, hot.] That branch of electrical science which investigates the effects produced by the electric current upon the temperature of a conductor or part of a circuit composed of two different metals.

electrothermotic (ē-lek'trō-thēr-mot'ik), a. Of or relating to heat generated by electricity.

electrothin (ē-lek'trō-tin), v. t.; pret. and pp. electrothinned, ppr. electrothinning. To electroplate with tin. See electroplating.

electrotint (ē-lek'trō-tint), n. Same as electrotinting.

electrotinting (ē-lek'trō-tin'ting), n. A method of making a design, etc., in relief, for printing, by drawing the lines on a metal plate with some varnish which resists the action of acids, and placing it in an electrobath, when the exposed portions are bitten in, leaving the protected parts in relief.

electrotome (ē-lek'trō-tōm), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + τομή, cutting, verbal adj. of τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] An automatic circuit-breaker. Greec. Dict. of Elect., p. 54.

electrotonic (ē-lek'trō-ton'ik), a. 1. Of or pertaining to electrical tension: applied by Faraday to what at one time he erroneously believed to be a peculiar latent state or condition of a conductor near another conductor through which an electric current was flowing.—2. Of, pertaining to, or produced by electrotonus.

electrotonicity (ē-lek'trō-tō-nis'i-ti), n. [electrotonic + -ity.] Same as electrotonus.

electrotonize (ē-lek'trō-tō-niz), v. t.; pret. and pp. electrotonized, ppr. electrotonizing. [electrotonic + -ize.] To alter the normal electric current of, as a nerve. See electrotonus.

electrotonous (ē-lek'trō-tō-nus), a. 1. Of or pertaining to electrical tension.—2. Of, pertaining to, or produced by electrotonus.

electrotonus (ē-lek'trō-tō-nus), n. [Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + τόνος, tension: see tone.] The altered state of a nerve or a muscle during the passage of a galvanic current through it. The irritability is heightened in the neighborhood of the cathode and diminished in that of the anode. The currents of rest in the nerve are increased or diminished according as they run in the same or an opposite direction to that of the galvanic current. Also electrotonos, electrotonicity.

electrotype (ē-lek'trō-tīp), n. [= F. électrotype; < Gr. ἤλεκτρον, amber (repr. electricity), + τύπος, figure, image: see type.] A copy in metal (precipitated by galvanic or electric action, usually in the form of a thin sheet) of any engraved or molded surface. Copies of medals, jewelry, and silverware, of woodcuts and pages of composed type, are common forms of electrotypes. The metal most used is copper, and the largest application of the process is to the preparation of plates for printing. The form of composed type is molded in wax, which is dusted or coated with black-lead in order to make it a conductor. The wax mold is suspended in a galvanic bath of sulphate of copper, through which a current of electricity is passed. The thin shell of copper which attaches to the mold is afterward backed with type-metal. Also electrotype, and commonly abbreviated electro.

electrotype (ē-lek'trō-tīp), v. t.; pret. and pp. electrotyped, ppr. electrotyping. [= F. électrotyper; from the noun.] To make a plate copy or plate copies of by electrical deposition.

electrotyper (ē-lek'trō-tī-pēr), n. 1. One who makes electrotypes.—2. The vat in which the electrotyping solution is held. [Eng.] electrotypic (ē-lek'trō-tīp'ik), a. Pertaining to or effected by means of electrotyping.

electrotyping (ē-lek'trō-tī-ping), n. The art or process of making electrotypes. Also called galvanoplastic process.

electrotypist (ē-lek'trō-tī-pist), n. [electrotype + -ist.] One who practises electrotypy.

electrotypy (ē-lek'trō-tī-pi), n. [= F. électrotypie; as electrotype + -y.] The process of electrotyping. Also called galvanoplastic.

electrovection (ē-lek'trō-vek'shon), n. [L. electrum, amber (repr. electricity), + vecctio (n.), a carrying, < vehere, pp. vecctus, carry: see convection, etc., vehicula.] Same as electrical endosmosis (which see, under endosmosis).

electrovital (ē-lek'trō-vī'tal), a. Electrical and dependent upon vital processes.

electrum (ē-lek'trūm), n. [Also electron; = F. électrum = Sp. Pg. electro = It. electro, < L. electrum, amber (called in pure L. succinum), also the metallic compound so called, < Gr. ἤλεκτρον, or ἤλεκτρος, amber, also an alloy of gold and silver, akin to ἤλεκτρον, the beaming sun, also fire as an element; to ἡλέκτρα, a fem. name; and prob. to Skt. arka, the sun, archis, flame, < arch, beam, shine.] A word used by Greek (ἤλεκτρον) and Latin (electrum) authors with various meanings at various times. From the time of Herodotus on its most common meaning in Greek was 'amber,' but it was also used for 'pure gold,' as by Sophocles. The Romans used electrum with the meaning of 'amber,' also as designating an alloy, which might be either natural or artificial, of silver and gold (Pliny gives the amount of silver present in electrum at one fifth of the whole). Later on, electrum was confounded with orichalc (which see), and in the middle ages had acquired the definite meaning of 'brass.' At all times, and especially among the Latin writers, there was more or less uncertainty in regard to the meaning of this word, and there was a tendency among both Greeks and Romans to use it just as adamant was frequently used, namely, as designating some ideal, imperfectly known substance possessed of almost miraculous properties.

electuary (ē-lek'tū-ā-ri), n.; pl. electuaries (-riz). [Also formerly electary; = OF. electuaire, F. electuaire = Sp. Pg. electuario = It. eletuario (also formerly, by aphesis, lectuary, < ME. letuarie, < OF. lettuare = Pr. lectoari, lactoari, = It. lattuario, lattivaro, > G. latwerge = Dan. latwerge = Sw. latwerg, < LL. electuarium, also electarium, an accom. (in simulation of L. electus, picked out; cf. ML. electuarium, the élite of a troop of soldiers) of electarium* (with L. suffix -arium), < Gr. ἐκλεκτόν (with equiv. ἐκλεῖν, < L. eligere: see elegem), an electuary, < ἐκλεῖν, lick up, < ἐκ, out, + λείπειν, lick: see lick.] In phar., a medicine composed of powders or other ingredients, incorporated with some conserve, honey, or syrup, originally made in a form to be licked by the patient.

"How do you do, my honest friend?" . . . "Very weakly, sir, since I took the electuary," answered the patient. Scott, Abbot, xxvi.

Eledone (el-e-dō'nē), n. [NL. (Leach, 1817), < Gr. ἐλεδώνη, a kind of polypus.] A genus of Eledone verrucosa.

cephalopods, typical of the family Eledonidae. E. verrucosa and E. cirrhosa are examples.

eledonid (e-led'ō-nid), n. A cephalopod of the family Eledonidae.

Eledonidae (el-e-don'ī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Eledone + -idae.] A family of octopod cephalopods, characterized by the development of but one row of suckers along each arm, but otherwise very similar to the Octopodidae, with which they are generally associated.

eleemosynarily (el-ē-mos'i-nā-ri-li), adv. In an eleemosynary manner; by way of charity; charitably.

eleemosynariness (el-ē-mos'i-nā-ri-nes), n. 1. The quality of being charitable.—2. The disposition to receive alms. —Bailey, 1727.

eleemosynary (el-ē-mos'i-nā-ri), a. and n. [ML. eleemosynarius, pertaining to alms, one who gives or receives alms, < eleemosyna, < Gr. ἑλεημοσύνη, alms; see alms, and cf. almoner, ult. a doublet of eleemosynary.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to alms; derived from or provided by charity; charitable: as, an eleemosynary fund; an eleemosynary hospital.

Eleemosynary relief never yet tranquilized the working-classes—it never made them grateful: it is not in human nature that it should. Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xvi.

The beds of patients (in the hospital at Beaune) are draped in curtains of dark red cloth, the traditional uniform of these eleemosynary couches. H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 251.

2. Relating to charitable donations; intended for the distribution of alms, or for the use and management of donations and bequests, whether for the subsistence of the poor or for the conferring of any gratuitous benefit.

The eleemosynary sort [of corporations] are such as are constituted for the perpetual distribution of the free alms, or bounty, of the founder of them to such persons as he has directed. Blackstone, Com., I. xviii.

Eleemosynary corporations are for the management of private property according to the will of the donors. D. Webster, Speech, March 10, 1818.

3. Dependent upon charity; receiving charitable aid or support: as, the eleemosynary poor.

In the accounts of Maxtoke priory, near Coventry, in the year 1430, it appears that the eleemosynary boys, or choristers, of that monastery acted a play. T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 390.

Eleemosynary corporation. See corporation. II. n.; pl. eleemosynaries (-riz). One who subsists on charity; one who lives by receiving alms.

Living as an eleemosynary upon a perpetual contribution from all and every part of the creation. South, Sermons, III. i.

elegance (el'ē-gans), n. [= D. elegantie, < G. eleganz = Dan. elegance = Sw. elegans, < OF. elegance, F. élégance = Sp. Pg. elegancia = It. eleganza, < L. elegantia, elegance, < elegan(t)-s, elegant: see elegant.] 1. The state or quality of being elegant; beauty resulting from perfect propriety or from exact fitness, symmetry, or the like; refinement of manner, quality, or appearance: as, elegance of dress.

Soracte, in January and April, rises from its blue horizon like an island from the sea, with an elegance of contour which no mood of the year can deepen or diminish.

H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 152.

Gray's perfect elegance could nowhere have found a more admirable foil than in the vulgar jauntiness and clumsy drollery of his correspondent, Mason.

Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 167.

2. That which pleases by its nicety, symmetry, purity, or beauty; an elegancy: as, the elegances of polite society. = Syn. 1. Grace, beauty, polish. See comparison under elegant.

elegancy (el'ē-gan-si), n.; pl. elegancies (-siz).

1. The quality of being elegant; elegance. [Rare.]

Let there be two delicate or rich cabinets, daintily paved, richly hanged, glazed with crystalline glass, and a rich cupola in the midst, and all other elegancy that may be thought upon. Bacon, Building (ed. 1887).

2. That which imparts elegance; an elegant characteristic or quality.

Such kind of inspired knowledge of strange tongues as includes all the native peculiarities, which, if you will, you may call their elegancies. Warburton, Doctrine of Grace, i. 8.

The beautiful wildness of nature, without the nicer elegancies of art. Spectator, No. 477.

elegant (el'ē-gant), a. [= D. G. Dan. Sw. elegant, < OF. élegant, F. élegant = Sp. Pg. It. elegante, < L. elegan(t)-s, sometimes spelled eligan(t)-s, of persons, luxurious, fastidious, choice, dainty, fine, tasteful, elegant; of things, choice, neat, fine, elegant; in form ppr. of an unused verb elegare*, prob. equiv. to eligere, ppr. eligen(t)-s, choose, pick out: see elect, eligible.] 1. Having good or fine taste; nice in taste; fastidious; sensible to beauty or propriety; discriminating beauty from deformity or imperfection: said of persons.

Under this contrariety of identification, an elegant critic aptly describes him.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, Int., p. vi.

Ere, now I see thou art exact of taste, And elegant, of sapience no small part. Milton, P. L., ix. 1018.

2. Polished; polite; refined; graceful: said of persons: as, an elegant lady or gentleman.—3. Characterized by or pertaining to good taste; indicating a refined propriety of taste: as, elegant manners.

Why will you endeavour to make yourself so disagreeable to me, and thwart me in every little elegant expense? Sheridan, School for Scandal, ii. 1.

4. Expressed with taste and neatness; correct and polished in expression or arrangement: as, an elegant style of composition; elegant speech.

I have likewise heard this elegant distichon.

Corryat, Crudities, I. 29.

Whoever wishes to attain an English style familiar but not coarse, and elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the volumes of Addison.

Johnson, Addison.

He entered the Church early, but devoted himself to the study of canon law and of elegant literature.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 414.

5. Pleasing to the eye by grace of form or delicacy of color; characterized by exquisiteness of design or fine taste; free from coarseness, blemish, or other defect; refined: as, an elegant figure; an elegant vase; an elegant structure.—6. Pleasing to the mind, as exhibiting fine perception of what is required; calculated to effect its purpose with exceeding accuracy, delicacy, and neatness; exquisitely ingenious or appropriate: as, an elegant modification of a philosophical instrument; an elegant algebraical formula or mathematical demonstration; an elegant chess problem.

An elegant sufficiency, content,

Retirement, rural quiet. Thomson, Spring, I. 1158.

= Syn. Elegant, Graceful, tasteful, courtly. Elegant implies that anything of an artificial character to which it is applied is the result of training and cultivation through the study of models or ideals of grace; graceful implies less of consciousness, and suggests often a natural gift. A rustic, uneducated girl may be naturally graceful, but not elegant. We speak of elegant manners, composition, furniture, taste, but of a graceful tree, fawn, child; the playful movements of a kitten may be graceful. See beautiful.

His easy art may happy nature seem,

Trifles themselves are elegant in him. Pope, Epistle to Miss Blount, l. 4.

Not proudly high nor nearly low,

A graceful myrtle rear'd its head. Montgomery, The Myrtle.

elegantemente (ā-lē-gān-te-men'te), adv. [It., elegantemente, < elegante, elegant, + -mente, an adv. suffix, orig. abl. of L. men(t)-s, mind, with preceding adj. in agreement.] With elegance; in a graceful and pleasing style: a direction in music.

elegantly (el'ē-gant-li), adv. In an elegant manner; with elegance.

Sir Henry Wotton . . . delivered his ambassage most elegantly in the Italian language.

I. Walton, Sir H. Wotton.

Dr. Warren preached before the Princess . . . of the blessedness of the pure in heart, most elegantly describing the bliss of the beatific vision.

Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 24, 1686.

elegiac (e-lē'ji-ak or e-lē'ji-ak), a. and n. [Formerly elegiack; = F. élegiaque = Sp. elegiaco = Pg. It. elegiaco, < LL. elegiacus, < Gr. ἐλεγιακός, < ἑλεγεία, ēlegēion, an elegy: see elegy.] I. a. 1. In anc. pros., an epithet noting a distich the first line of which is a dactylic hexameter and the second a pentameter, or verse differing from the hexameter by suppression of the arsis or metrically unaccented part of the third and the sixth foot, thus:

~~~~~|~~~~~|~~~~~|~~~~~|~~~~~|~~~~~

Verses or poems consisting of elegiac distichs are called elegiac verses or poems (elegiacs); poetry composed in this meter, elegiac verse or poetry (the elegy); and the writers who employed this verse, especially those who employed it exclusively or by preference, are known as the elegiac poets. Elegiac verse seems to have been used primarily in threnetic pieces (poems lamenting or commemorating the dead), or to have been associated with music of a kind regarded by the Greeks as mournful. Almost from its first appearance in literature, however, it is found used for compositions of various kinds. The principal Roman elegiac poets are Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, and Ovid. In modern German literature the elegiac meter has been frequently used, especially by Goethe and Schiller. Coleridge's translation from the latter poet may serve as an example in English.

In the hēx | āmētēr | risēš thē | fōuntāin's | silvērý | cōl-ūnn,
In the pēn | tāmētēr | āyē | fālling in | melōdý | bāck.

Coleridge, The Ovidian Elegiac Meter.

You should crave his rule

For pauses in the elegiac couplet, chasms

Permissible only to Catullus!

Browning, Ring and Book, I. 276.

2. Belonging to an elegy, or to elegy; having to do with elegies.

Arnold is a great elegiac poet, but there is a buoyancy in his elegy which we rarely find in the best elegy, and which certainly adds greatly to its charm.

Contemporary Rev., XLIX. 528.

Hence—3. Expressing sorrow or lamentation: as, elegiac strains.

Let elegiac lay the woe relate,
Soft as the breath of distant flutes.

Gay, Trivia.

Mr. Lyttleton is a gentle elegiac person.

Gray, Letters, I. 220.

II. n. In pros.: (a) A pentameter, or verse consisting of two dactylic penthemimim or written in elegiac meter. (b) pl. A succession of distichs consisting each of a dactylic hexameter and a dipenthemim; a poem or poems in such distichs: as, the Heroides and Tristia of Ovid are written in elegiacs. See I.

elegiacal (el-ē'ji-ā-kal), a. [elegiac + -al.] Same as elegiac.

He was the author of a very large number of volumes of lyrical, elegiacal and romantic verse. The American, VIII. 251.

elegiambi, n. Plural of elegiambus.

elegiambic (el'e-jī-am'bik), a. and n. [< Gr. ἑλεγίαιον, the meter of the elegy, + ἰαμβικός, iambic: see elegy and iambic.] I. a. Consisting of h if an elegiac pentameter followed by an iambic dimeter; being or constituting an elegiambus (which see): as, an elegiambic verse.

II. n. A verse consisting of a dactylic penthemim followed by an iambic dimeter; an elegiambus (which see).

elegiambus (el'e-jī-am'bus), n.; pl. elegiambi (-bi). [LL. (Marius Victorinus, Ars Gram., iv.), < L. elegia, elegy, + iambus, iambus.] A compound verse, consisting of a dactylic penthemim (group of two dactyls and the thesis or long syllable of a third) and an iambic dimeter, thus:

~~~~~|~~~~~|~~~~~|~~~~~|~~~~~|~~~~~

elegiast (e-lē'ji-ast or e-lē'ji-ast), n. [< elegy (L. elegia) + -ast.] An elegist. [Rare.]

The great fault of these elegiasts is, that they are in despair for griefs that give the sensible part of mankind very little pain. Goldsmith, Vicar, xvi.

elegiographer (el'ē'ji-og'ra-fēr), n. [< Gr. ἐλεγιογράφος, a writer of elegies, < ἑλεγεία, an elegy, + γράφειν, write.] A writer of elegies, or of poems in elegiac verse. [Rare.]

Elegiographer, one who writes mournful songs. Cockram.

elegious (e-lē'ji-us), a. [< Gr. ἐλεγίαιος, elegiaios, < ἑλεγεία, ēlegēia, an elegy; < ἑλεῖν, ēleō, to lament.] Elegiac; hence, lamenting; melancholy. [Rare.]

If your elegious breath should hap to rouse
A happy tear, close harbing in his eye,
Then urge his plighted faith.

Quarles, Emblems, v. 1.

elegist (el'ē-jist), n. [< elegy + -ist.] A writer of elegies.

Our elegist, and the chroniclers, impute the crime of withholding so pious a legacy to the advice of the king of France.
T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, I. 108.

elegit (ē-lē'jit), n. [L., he has chosen: 3d pers. sing. perf. ind. of eligere, choose: see elect.] 1. In law, in England and in some of the United States, a judicial writ of execution, which may at the election of the creditor issue on a judgment or on a forfeiture of recognizance, commanding the sheriff to take the judgment debtor's goods, and, if necessary thereafter, his lands, and deliver them to the judgment creditor, who can retain them until the satisfaction of the judgment.—2. The title to land held under execution of a writ of elegit.

elegize (el'ē-jīz), v. i. or t.; pret. and pp. elegized, ppr. elegizing. [< elegy + -ize.] To write or compose elegies; celebrate or lament after the style of an elegy; bewail.

I . . . perhaps should have elegized on for a page or two farther, when Harry, who has no idea of the dignity of grief, blundered in.
H. Walpole, Letters, II. 371.

elegy (el'ē-jī), n.; pl. elegies (-jīz). [Formerly eclogie; = D. G. eclogie = Dan. Sw. eclogi; < OF. eclogie, F. éclogie = Sp. eclogia = Pg. It. eclogia, < L. eclogia, also eclogā, eclogia, < Gr. ἔκλογια, fem. sing., but orig. neut. pl., ἔκλογια, an eclogiac poem, in reference to the meter (later a lament, an elegy), pl. of ἔκλογιον, a distich consisting of a hexameter and a pentameter (> L. eclogium, eclogium, eclogia, eclogion, an elegy; cf. L. dim. eclogidion, eclogidarium, a short elegy), neut. (so. μέτρον, meter, or ῥυθμός, poem) of ἔκλογος, pertaining to a song of mourning, elegiac, < ἔλεος, a song of mourning, a lament, later (in reference to the usual meter of such songs) any poem in distichs; origin unknown. The usual derivation from ἐλὲ λέγε, 'cry woe! woe!' a refrain in such songs (ἐλὲ or rather ἐλ, an interjection of pain or grief, like E. ah, *ay*2, etc.; λέγε, 2d pers. sing. impv. of λέγω, say), is no doubt erroneous.] 1. In classical poetry, a poem written in elegiac verse.

The third sorrowing was of Iones, by long lamentation in Elegy: so was their song called, and it was in a pitiuous manner of metre, placing a limping Pentameter after a lusty Exometer, which made it do dolorously more than any other meter.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 39.

2. A mournful or plaintive poem; a poem or song expressive of sorrow and lamentation; a dirge; a funeral song.

And there is such a solemn melody,
'Tween doleful songs, tears and sad elegies.
Webster, White Devil, v. 1.

Let Swans from their forsaken Rivers fly,
And sick'ning at her Tomb, make haste to dye,
That they may help to sing her Elegy.
Congreve, Death of Queen Mary.

3. Any serious poem pervaded by a tone of melancholy, whether grief is actually expressed or not: as, Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard."

Elegy is the form of poetry natural to the reflective mind. It may treat of any subject, but it must treat of no subject for itself, but always and exclusively with reference to the poet himself.
Coleridge.

4. In music, a sad or funeral composition, vocal or instrumental, whether actually commemorative or not; a dirge. = syn. Dirge, Requiem, etc. See dirge.

eleidin (e-lē'idīn), n. [< Gr. ἔλαια, olive-oil, oil, + -id + *-in*2.] In chem., a substance found in the stratum granulosum and elsewhere in the epidermis, and staining very deeply with carmine: regarded by Waldeyer as identical with hyaline, and called on that account by Unna ceratohyalin.

element (el'ē-ment), n. [< ME. element, < OF. element, F. élément = Sp. Pg. It. elemento = D. G. Dan. Sw. element, < L. elementum, a first principle, element, rudiment, pl. first principles, the elements (of existing things), the elements of knowledge, the alphabet; origin uncertain. The common derivation of the word from alere, nourish, which would identify elementum with alimentum, nourishment (see aliment), is wholly improbable. Several other derivations have been proposed, of which one assumes the orig. sense to be 'the alphabet,' the 'A-B-C,' or lit. the 'L-M-N,' the word being formed, in this view, < el + em + en, the names of the letters L, M, N, + the term. -tum, as in the common formative -mentum, E. -ment.] 1. That of which anything is in part compounded, which exists in it, and which is itself not decomposable into parts of different kinds; a fundamental or ultimate part or principle; hence, in general, any component part; any constituent part or principle.

Alone, and its quick elements, will, passion,
Reason, imagination, cannot die. Shelley, Hellas.
Noble architecture is one element of culture.

That element of tragedy which lies in the very fact of frequency has not yet wrought itself into the coarse emotion of mankind.
George Eliot, Middlemarch, I. 214.

Three tribes, settlers on three hills, were the elements of which the original Roman Commonwealth was made.
E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 285.

Specifically—(a) An ingredient, especially of the temperament.

There's little of the melancholy element in her, my lord.
Shak., Much Ado, II. 1.

(b) pl. The rudimentary principles of any science: as, Euclid's "Elements" (Gr. στοιχεῖα), a work setting forth in an orderly and logical way the simple and fundamental propositions of geometry. (c) In geom., one of the points, lines, or planes, or other geometrical forms, by which a figure or geometrical construction is made up. "Space may be considered as a geometrical figure whose elements are either points or planes. Taking the points as elements, the straight lines of space are so many ranges, and the planes of space so many planes of points. If, on the other hand, the planes are considered as elements, the straight lines of space are the axes of so many axial pencils, and points of space are centers of so many sheaves of planes" (Cresona, Geom., tr. by Leudesdorf, § 81). (d) In math., one of a number of objects arranged in a symmetrical or regular figure. The elements of a determinant are the quantities arranged in a square block or matrix, the sum of whose products forms the determinant. (e) In astron., one of the quantities necessary to be known in calculating the place of a planet (perhaps because the planets were called elements). They are six, namely, the longitude of the ascending node, the inclination of the orbit to the ecliptic, the longitude of the perihelion, the mean distance from the sun, the mean longitude at any epoch, and the eccentricity. Hence—(f) A datum required for the solution of any problem. (g) pl. The bread and wine used in the eucharist: distinctively called communion elements.

When all have communicated, the Bishop shall return to the Lord's Table, and reverently place upon it what remaineth of the consecrated Elements, covering the same with a fair linen cloth.

Book of Common Prayer, Holy Communion.

(h) In biol., one of the primary or embryological parts composing the body of an animal, or of the pieces which have united to form any part. Thus, the thorax of an insect is composed of three principal elements or rings, the operculum is formed of several elements or pieces which are sutured together, etc. (i) In elect., a voltaic cell. See cell.

The hydronate of potassium batteries, composed of four troughs with six compartments, making twenty-four elements in circuit. A mercury commutator enabled us to use at pleasure six, twelve, eighteen, or twenty-four elements, and thus to obtain four different speeds of the screw [of an electric balloon].
Science, III. 154.

2. One of the four things, fire, water, earth, and air (to which ether was added as a fifth element), falsely regarded by the ancients as the constituents of which all things are composed. Water, as an element, consists of all that is in the rain, the rivers, the sea, etc.; fire, of lightning, the sun, etc.; these, together with the air and earth, were supposed to make up the matter of nature. The elements often means in a particular sense wind and water, especially in action: as, the fury of the elements.

"It is a water that is said I saye,
Of elementes foure," quod Plaut.
Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale (ed. Skeat), G. l. 1460.
30 have thanne in the ampulle if elementis: that is to seie, watir and eyr.
Book of Quinto Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 12.

My Ariel,—chick—
That's thy charge: then to the elements!
Be free, and fare thee well! Shak., Tempest, v. 1.

I've heard
Schoolmen affirm, man's body is compos'd
Of the four elements. Massinger, Renegado, III. 2.
And, lost each human trace, surrendering up Thine individual being, shalt thou go
To mix forever with the elements.
Bryant, Thanatopsis.

3. A kind of matter undecomposable into other kinds. The elements as enumerated by Empedocles, and generally recognized as identical, were four—fire, water, earth, and air. (See 2.) The older chemists, of the fifteenth century and later, recognized three elements—sulphur, mercury, and salt. In modern chemistry an element, or elementary body, is regarded merely as a simple substance which has hitherto resisted analysis by any known chemical means. The list of such elements is a provisional one, since it is possible, and not improbable, that many bodies now considered elementary may be proved to be compound. There are about 70 elements at present (1889) recognized by chemists, commonly divided into two groups, namely, metals and the non-metallic bodies or metalloids. The non-metallic elements are hydrogen, chlorine, bromine, iodine, fluorine, oxygen, sulphur, selenium, tellurium, nitrogen, phosphorus, arsenic, antimony, bismuth, boron, silicon, and carbon. (See metalloid.) The remaining elements are regarded as metals. (See metal.) Five of the elements, oxygen, nitrogen, hydrogen, chlorine, and fluorine, are gases at ordinary temperatures; two, bromine and mercury, are liquids; the rest are solids. The properties of all the elements bear a close relation to their atomic weights. (See periodic law, under periodic.) The following is a list of the elements with symbols and atomic weights.

| Elements. | Symbols. | Atomic Weights. |
|---------------------------------|----------|-----------------|
| Aluminium | Al | 27.1 |
| Antimony | Sb | 120 |
| Arsenic | As | 75 |
| Barium | Ba | 137.1 |
| Beryllium (see glucium) | Be | |
| Bismuth | Bi | 208 |
| Boron | B | 11 |
| Bromine | Br | 80 |
| Cadmium | Cd | 112.1 |
| Cæsium | Cs | 132.8 |
| Calcium | Ca | 40 |
| Carbon | C | 12 |
| Cerium | Ce | 141.5 |
| Chlorine | Cl | 35.5 |
| Chromium | Cr | 52.3 |
| Cobalt | Co | 58.8 |
| Columbium (see niobium) | — | — |
| Copper | Cu | 63.8 |
| Decupium | Dp | 171 |
| Didymium | D or Di | 145 |
| Erbium | Er | 166 |
| Fluorine | F or Fl | 19 |
| Gallium | Ga | 70 |
| Germanium | Ge | 72.3 |
| Glucium | Be or Gl | 9.1 |
| Gold | Au | 196.7 |
| Hydrogen | H | 1 |
| Indium | In | 113.7 |
| Iodine | I | 126.9 |
| Iridium | Ir | 193 |
| Iron | Fe | 56 |
| Lanthanum | La | 138 |
| Lead | Pb | 206.9 |
| Lithium | Li | 7 |
| Magnesium | Mg | 24.4 |
| Manganese | Mn | 55 |
| Mercury | Hg | 200.1 |
| Molybdenum | Mo | 96 |
| Nickel | Ni | 58 |
| Niobium | Nb | 94 |
| Nitrogen | N | 14 |
| Osmium | Os | 196 |
| Oxygen | O | 16 |
| Palladium | Pd | 106.6 |
| Phosphorus | P | 31 |
| Platinum | Pt | 194.9 |
| Potassium | K | 39.1 |
| Rhodium | Rh | 104 |
| Rubidium | Rb | 85.4 |
| Ruthenium | Ru | 104 |
| Samarium | Sm | 150 |
| Scandium | Sc | 44 |

| Silver | Ag | 107.9 |
| Sodium | Na | 23 |
| Strontium | Sr | 87.5 |
| Sulphur | S | 32 |
| Tantalum | Ta | 182.8 |
| Tellurium | Te | 125 |
| Terbium | Tb | 162 |
| Thallium | Tl | 204.2 |
| Thorium | Th | 233 |
| Tin | Su | 118.1 |
| Titanium | Ti | 48.1 |
| Tungsten | W | 184 |
| Uranium | U | 240 |
| Vanadium | V | 51.3 |
| Ytterbium | Yb | 173 |
| Yttrium | Y | 89.5 |
| Zinc | Zn | 65.3 |
| Zirconium | Zr | 90.5 |

There are a number of other bodies which have been named as elements (as phillippium, scandium, norwegium, etc.), whose properties have, however, not been sufficiently investigated and defined to warrant their inclusion in the list.

4. The proper or natural environment of anything; that in which something exists; hence, the sphere of experience of a person; the class of persons with whom one naturally associates, or the sphere of life with which one is familiar: as, he is out of his element.

We are simple men; we do not know what's brought to pass under the profession of fortune-telling. She works by charms, by spells, by the figure, and such daubery as this is, beyond our element: We know nothing.
Shak., M. W. of W., IV. 2.

This Tim is the head of a species: he is a little out of his element in this town; but he is a relation of Tranquillus, and his neighbour in the country, which is the true place of residence for this species.
Steele, Tatler, No. 85.

Circulating element. See circulate.—Double element. See double.—Element of a figure, in the calculus, an infinitesimal part of it.—Elements of a crystal. See parameter.—Magnetic elements of a place, the declination and inclination of the magnetic needle and the intensity of the earth's magnetic attraction.—Osculating elements. See osculate.

element (el'ē-ment), v. t. [< element, n.] 1. To compound of elements or first principles.

Whether any one such body be met with, in those said to be elemented bodies, I now question.
Boyle.

2. To constitute; form from elements; compose; enter into the constitution of.

Dull, sublimary lover's love (Whose soul is sense) cannot admit Of absence, 'cause it doth remove
The thing which elemented it.
Donne, Vindication Forbidding Mourning.

These [good life and good works] are the two elements, and he which is elemental from these hath the complexion of a good man, and a fit friend. Donne, Letters, xxx.

elemental (el-ē-men'tal), a. and n. [= Sp. Pg. elemental; as element + -al.] 1. Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of an element or elements.

In and near the photosphere, or underneath it, matter must be in its most elemental state.

C. A. Young, The Sun, p. 295.

There is spectroscopic evidence which seems to show that, starting with a mass of solid elemental matter, such mass of matter is continually broken up as the temperature is raised.

J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 126.

2. Pertaining or relating to first principles; simple; elementary. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Some elemental knowledge, I suppose, they [the druids] had; but I can scarcely be persuaded that their learning was either deep or extensive.

Burke, Abriq. of Eng. Hist., i. 2.

3. Of or pertaining to the elements of the material world: more especially used of the mobile elements, fire, air, and water, with reference to their violent or destructive action. See element, 2 and 3.

If dusky spots are vary'd on his brow,
And streak'd with red, a troubled colour show;
That sullen mixture shall at once declare Winds, rain, and storms, and elemental war.

Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics.

But all subsists by elemental strife;
And passions are the elements of life.

Pope, Essay on Man, i. 169.

Elemental law of thought, a first principle; a fundamental belief.

II. n. A spirit of the elements; a nature-spirit. See 1., 3., and element, 2 and 3.

elementalism (el-ē-men'tal-izm), n. [elemental + -ism.] The theory which identifies the divinities of the ancients with the elemental powers. Gladstone.

elementality (el'ē-men'tal'i-ti), n. [elemental + -ity.] The state of being elemental or elementary.

By this I hope the elementality (that is, the universality) of detraction, or disparagement, . . . is out of dispute.

Whitlock, Manners of Eng. People, p. 456.

elementally (el-ē-men'tal-i), adv. In an elemental manner; with reference to or as regards elements.

Those words taken circumspectly, without regard to any precedent law of Moses, are as much against plain equity . . . as those words of "Take, eat, this is my body," elementally understood, are against nature and sense.

Christian Religion's Appeal, xv. (Ord MS.).

Legislate as much as you please, you cannot abolish the fact of the sexes. Constititively, elementally the same, Man and Woman are organized on different bases. Like the stars, they differ in their glory.

G. D. Boardman, Creative Week, p. 232.

elementar (el-ē-men'tär), a. [L. elementarius: see elementary.] Elementary.

What thing occasioned the showers of rayne
Of fyre elementar in his supreme spere.

Skelton, Garland of Laurel.

elementariness (el-ē-men'tä-ri-nes), n. The state of being elementary.

elementarity (el'ē-men'tar'i-ti), n. [elementar + -ity.] Elementariness.

For though Moses have left no mention of minerals, nor made any other description then suits unto the apparent and visible creation, yet is there unquestionably a very large class of creatures in the earth far above the condition of elementarity. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 1.

elementary (el-ē-men'tä-ri), a. [= D. elementär = G. elementär (in comp.), also elementarisch = Dan. elementær = Sw. elementär (D. Dan. Sw. after F.) (Dan. Sw. also elementär in comp.) = F. élémentaire = Pr. Sp. Pg. elementar, Pg. also elementario = It. elementare, elementario, < L. elementarius, belonging to the elements or rudiments, < elementum, element, rudiment: see element.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of an element or elements; primary; simple; uncompounded; incomplex: as, an elementary substance.

They [chemists] have found it impossible to obtain from oxygen anything but oxygen, or from hydrogen anything but hydrogen; and, in the present state of our knowledge, these bodies are consequently regarded as elementary or simple substances. Huxley, Physiography, p. 105.

Without ritual, religion may exist in its elementary state, and this state, of religion is what may be described as habitual and permanent admiration.

J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 70.

The primitive homestead, . . . where all things were elementary and of the plainest cast.

Stedman, Poets of America, p. 101.

2. Initial; rudimental; containing, teaching, or discussing first principles, rules, or rudiments: as, an elementary treatise or disquisition; elementary education; elementary schools.

It is probable that before the time of Aristotle there were elementary treatises of geometry which are now lost.

Reid, Inquiry into Human Mind.

Such a pedantic abuse of elementary principles as would have disgraced boys at school. Burke, Army Estimates.

3. Treating of elements; collecting, digesting, or explaining principles: as, an elementary writer.

Elementary analysis, in chem., the estimation of the amounts of the elements which together form a compound body. Elementary angles, in crystal, angles between particular faces characteristic of particular minerals. Elementary body. See element, 3. Elementary particles of Zimmermann. See blood-plate. Elementary proposition, a self-evident and indemonstrable proposition. Elementary substances. See element, 3.

elementation (el'ē-men'tä'shon), n. [element, v., + -ation.] Instruction in elements or first principles. Coleridge. [Rare.]

elementist (el'ē-men'tish), a. [element + -ish.] Elemental; elementary.

If you mean of many natures conspiring together, as in a popular government, to establish this fair estate, as if the elementist and ethereal parts should in their town-house set down the bounds of each one's office, then consider what follows: that there must needs have been a wisdom which made them concur. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

elementoid (el-ē-men'toid), a. [L. elementum + Gr. εἶδος, form.] Like an element; having the appearance of a simple substance: as, compounds which have an elementoid nature, and perform elemental functions.

elemi (el'e-mi), n. [= F. élémi = Sp. elemí = Pg. It. elemi; of Eastern, said to be of Ar., origin.] A name of fragrant resins of various kinds, all of them probably the product of trees belonging to the natural order Burseraceæ. The Oriental or African elemi of the older writers is an exudation from Boswellia Freereana, a tree found in the region south of the gulf of Aden. It is used in the East for chewing, like tobacco. The elemi of pharmacy comes chiefly from Manila, and is the product of Canarium commune. It is a stimulant resin, and is used in plasters and ointments. Other sorts are Mexican or Vera Cruz elemi, obtained from species of Bursera; Brazilian elemi, from various species of Protium (Icica); and Mauritius elemi, from Canarium paniculatum.

elemine (el'e-min), n. [elemi + -in.] The crystallizable portion of elemi.

elench (ē-leng'k'), n. [L. elenchus, < Gr. ἐλέγχω, an argument of disproof or refutation, a cross-examining, < ἐλέγχειν, disgrace, put to shame, cross-examine for the purpose of refuting, put to the proof, confute, refute.] In logic, an argumentation concluding the falsity of something maintained; a refutation; a confutation; also, a false refutation; a sophism. Also elenchus.

Reprehension or elench is a syllogism which gathereth a conclusion contrary to the assertion of the respondent.

Blundeville (1609).

The sophistical elenchus or refutation, being a delusive semblance of refutation which imposes on ordinary men and induces them to accept it as real, cannot be properly understood without the theory of elenchus in general; nor can this last be understood without the entire theory of the syllogism, since the elenchus is only one variety of syllogism. The elenchus is a syllogism with a conclusion contradictory to or refutative of some enunciated thesis or proposition. Accordingly we must understand the conditions of a good and valid syllogism before we study those of a valid elenchus; these last, again, must be understood, before we enter on the distinctive attributes of the pseudo-elenchus—the sophistical, invalid, or sham, refutation. Grote.

Ignorance of the elench. See fallacy of irrelevant conclusion, under fallacy.

elenchic, elenchical (ē-leng'kik, -ki-kal), a. [elench + -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to or of the nature of an elench; refuting; confutative; sophistical. Bailey, 1776.

elenchically (ē-leng'ki-kal-i), adv. By means of an elench. Imp. Dict.

elenchize (ē-leng'kiz), v. i. [Gr. ἐλέγχειν, confute, + -ize.] To dispute; refute.

Tip. Hear him problematize.

Pro. Bless us, what's that?

Tip. Or syllogize, elenchize. B. Jonson, New Inn, ii. 2.

elenchtic, elenchtical, a. Erroneous forms of elenchic, elenchical.

elenchus (ē-leng'kus), n. 1. Same as elench. —2. [cap.] [NL.] (a) A genus of gastropods. Humphreys, 1797. (b) A genus of Strepsiptera. Curtis, 1831.

elenctic, elenctical (ē-leng'k'ik, -ti-kal), a. [Also written, erroneously, elenchic, -al.] < Gr. ἐλεγκτικός, refutative, < ἐλεγκτός, verbal adj. of ἐλέγχειν, refute, confute: see elench.] Same as elenchic.

elenge, ellinga, a. [Now only dial.; < ME. elenge, also, less often, elynge, eling; perhaps an alteration, with suffix -ing, of AS. ellende, elelande, with equiv. elendissid, ME. elendissid, helendissid, helendissid, -isse, foreign, strange, living in a foreign land (eleland, a foreign land), = OS. elilendi = D. ellendig = OHG. elilenti, foreign, living in a foreign land, MHG. ellende, the same, also unhappy, wretched, G. elend, unhappy, wretched, = Dan. elendig, = Sw. eländig, unhappy, wretched; < AS. ele-, el-, other (see else and alien), + land, land. The same development of sense appears in wretched, ult. < AS. wrecca, an outcast, exile.] Cheerless; wretched; miserable; unhappy.

Heuy-chere I gede, and elyng in herte.

Piers Plowman (B), xx. 2.

Poverty is this, although it seme elenge,
Possession that no wright wil challenge.

Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 344.

elengelyt, adv. [ME., also elengelych; < elenge + -lyt.] Cheerlessly; miserably.

Allisander that al wan elenglich ended.

Piers Plowman (B), xii. 45.

elengenisset, ellengnessit, n. [Early mod. E. ellengness; < ME. ellengnesse.] Sorrow; trouble. Rom. of the Rose.

Eleocharis (el-ē-ok'a-ris), n. [NL., prop. Heleocharis*, < Gr. ἑλος (gen. ἑλός), low ground for rivers, marsh-meadows, + χαίρειν, rejoice, > χαρίς, favor, delight.] A genus of cyperaceous plants, of about 80 species, growing in wet places, and distributed over all tropical and temperate regions. They are characterized by terete or angular culms closely sheathed at the base, and bearing a naked, solitary terminal head of closely imbricated scales. There are about 80 North American species. Commonly known as spike-rush.

Eleotragus (el-ē-ō'trä-gus), n. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1846), prop. Heleotragus*, < Gr. ἑλος (gen. ἑλός), a marsh, + τράγος, a goat.] A genus of antelopes, containing such as the riet-bok or reed-buck of South Africa, E. arundinaceus.

Eleotridinae (el-ē-ō'tri-dī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Eleotris (-rid) + -inae.] A subfamily of gobioid fishes closely resembling the Gobiinae, but with separated ventral fins. Also Eleotrine.

Eleotris (el-ē-ō'tris), n. [NL. (Gronovius).] A genus of fishes, typical of the subfamily Eleotridinae.

elephant (el'ē-fant), n. [ME. elefant, elefant, elefant, earlier and more commonly olifant, olifaunt, olefaunt, olifaunt, olifant, olifunt (rarely, in later ME., spelled with ph, as in L.), < OF. olifant, also elefant, F. éléphant = Pr. elephante = Sp. elefante = Pg. elefante, elephante = It. elefante = AS. elpend, elp, ylp, an elephant (see alp), = MD. D. elefant (also MD. elefant, olifant, D. olifant, < OF.) = MLG. elefant, elefant, also elpender, olvant = OHG. elafant, elfant, helfant, MHG. elefant, elfant, elfent, G. elefant, elephante = Dan. Sw. elefant (cf. Goth. ubandus = OHG. olbanta, olbenta, olbanda, MHG. olbende, olbent = AS. olfend, a camel: see camel), < L. elephas, elephas (elephant), also elephantus, and ML. elefantus, < Gr. ἑλέφας (ἑλεφαν), an elephant (first in Herodotus, ivory (first in Homer and Hesiod); perhaps < Heb. eleph, an ox (cf. Lucabos, Lucanian ox, the older L. name: see alpha); but some compare Heb. ἱθάχ, Skt. ἱθάχ, an elephant, and L. ebur, ivory: see ivory. The Slav. and Oriental names are different: OBulg. slo-nū = Bohem. slon = Pol. slon = Russ. slonū (> Lith. slanas), elephant; Turk. Ar. fil, Hind. fil, pil, < Pers. pil, elephant; Hind. hāthi, hātī, < Skt. hastin, elephant, < hastā, hand, trunk.] 1. A five-toed proboscidean mammal, of the genus Elephas, constituting a subfamily, Elephan- tina, and comprehending two living species, namely, Elephas indicus and Elephas (Loxodon) africanus. The former inhabits India, and is characterized by a concave high forehead, small ears, and comparatively small tusks; the latter is found in Africa, and has a convex forehead, great flapping ears, and large tusks. The tusks occur in both sexes, curving upward from the extremity of the upper jaw. The nose is prolonged into a cylindrical trunk or proboscis, at the extremity of which the nostrils open. The trunk is extremely flexible, and highly sensitive, and terminates in a finger-like prehensile lobe. Elephants are the largest quadrupeds at present existing. Their tusks are of great value as ivory, furnishing an important article of commerce, in Africa especially, and occasioning the destruction of great numbers of these animals. Ten species of fossil elephants have been described, of which the best-known is the hairy mammoth, E. primigenius. The mastodonts are nearly related to elephants, but form a separate subfamily Mastodontinae (which see).

African Elephant (Elephas or Loxodon africanus).

Than he returned toward him with his bettel in his honde, and put his targe hym be-fore that was of the bon of an Olyfante.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 338.

The castelles . . . that craftily ben sett upon the *olyfant*es bakkes.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 191.

He is as valiant as the lion, churlish as the bear, slow as the elephant.
Shak., T. and C., i. 2.

2. Figuratively, a burdensome or perplexing possession or charge; something that one does not know what to do with or how to get rid of; as, to have an elephant on one's hands; he found his great house very much of an elephant.
—3. Ivory; the tusk of the elephant. [Poetical.]

High o'er the gate, in elephant and gold,
The crowd shall Caesar's Indian war behold.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics.

4. A drawing- or writing-paper measuring in America 22 × 27 inches.—A white elephant, a possession or a dignity more troublesome and costly than profitable: in allusion to the rare and highly venerated white elephants of the East Indies, which must be kept in royal state, and which are said to be sometimes presented by the King of Siam to courtiers whom he desires to ruin.

Bazaine bethought him of his master's natural anxiety to know the situation. That master was the white elephant of Bazaine and the army.

Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 58.
Double elephant, a drawing- or writing-paper measuring in England 26½ or 27 × 40 inches, and in America (where it is also called double royal) 26 × 40 inches.—Elephant hawk-moth. See hawk-moth.—Order of the White Elephant, a Danish order alleged to be of great antiquity. Its foundation, however, is specifically ascribed to Christian I., 1462, and its reorganization to Christian V., 1693. It is limited to 30 knights besides the members of the royal family, and no person can be a knight who is not previously a member of the order of the Danebrog. The collar of the order is composed alternately of elephants and embattled towers. The badge is an elephant bearing on his back a tower, and on his head a driver dressed like a Hindu. The ribbon to which the badge is attached on ordinary occasions is sky-blue.—Rogue elephant, an elephant of ungovernably bad temper, which lives alone or apart from the herd, and is regarded as particularly dangerous.—To see or to show the elephant, to see or exhibit something strange or wonderful; especially, to see for the first time, or exhibit to a stranger, the sights and scenes of a great city (often implying those of a low or disreputable kind). [Slang. U. S.] elephant-apple (el'ē-fant-ap'l), n. The wood-apple of India, Feronia elephantum, a large rutaceous tree allied to the orange, and bearing an orange-like fruit. The pulp of the fruit is acid, and is made into a jelly.

elephant-beetle (el'ē-fant-bē'tl), n. 1. A name of several lamellicorn scarabæoid beetles of enormous size. Specifically—(a) Any species of the cetonian genus Goliathus. See Goliath-beetle. (b) Any species of either of the genera Dynastes and Megapoma. M. elephas is a large American species. Some of the elephant-beetles, as Dynastes hercules of tropical America, attain a total length of 6 inches, but of this the long prothoracic horn makes about half. See cut under Hercules-beetle.

2. One of the rhynchophorous beetles or weevils; so called from the long snout or proboscis.
elephant-bird (el'ē-fant-bērd), n. A fossil bird of Madagascar, of the genus Archyornis (which see).

elephant-creeper (el'ē-fant-krē'pēr), n. The Argyria speciosa, a convolvulaceous woody climber of India, reaching the tops of the tallest trees. Its leaves are white-tomentose beneath, and its deep-rose-colored flowers are borne in axillary cymes. The leaves are used for poultices and in various cutaneous diseases.

elephanter (el'ē-fan'tēr), n. A heavy periodical ranter at Bombay.

elephant-fish (el'ē-fant-fish), n. A name of the southern chimera, Callorhynchus antarcticus: so called on account of the prolongation of the Elephant-fish (Callorhynchus antarcticus).

snout, which has a peculiar proboscis-like appendage, serving as a prehensile organ. It is an inhabitant of the southern Pacific and the vicinity of the Cape of Good Hope, and is sometimes eaten.

elephant-grass (el'ē-fant-grās), n. An East Indian bur-reed, Typha elephantina, the pollen of which is made into bread by the natives of Sind.

elephantiac (el'ē-fan'ti-ak), a. [L. elephantiacus, < elephantiasis: see elephantiasis.] Of the nature of or affected with elephantiasis.

elephantiasis (el'ē-fan-ti'ā-sis), n. [L. elephantiasis, < Gr. ἐλεφαντίασις, a skin-disease, so called from its giving the skin the appearance of an elephant's hide, < ἐλέφας (ēlēfant), elephant: see elephant.] A name given to several forms of skin-disease. (a) Elephantiasis Arabum, or pachydermia. See pachydermia. (b) Elephantiasis Grecorum, or leprosy. See lepra.

elephantid (el'ē-fan'tid), n. A proboscidean mammal of the family Elephantidae, as an elephant, mammoth, or mastodon.

Elephantidae (el'ē-fan-ti'dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elephas (-phant-) + -idae.] A family of the order Proboscidea, containing the living elephants and the fossil mammoths and mastodonts. See mammoth, mastodon. These huge pachyderms have the upper incisors enormously developed as cylindro-conic tusks, projecting from the mouth and growing indefinitely; the lower incisors small or null, the molars successively displacing one another from behind forward, so that no premolars replace the deciduous teeth, and never more than one or two molars in functional position at once in either jaw; and the grinding surfaces with several transverse ridges alternating with cement-valleys. The skull is very high in front, to accommodate the roots of the tusks, there being a great development of diploic structure. The family is divided into two subfamilies, Elephantinae and Mastodontinae. See cuts under elephant and Elephantinae.

Elephantinae (el'ē-fan-ti'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Elephas (-phant-) + -inae.] The typical subfamily of the Elephantidae, containing the living elephants and the extinct mammoths. They have the isomerous as distinguished from the hypsimerous.

Skeleton and Outline of African Elephant (Elephas or Loxodon africanus).

fr. frontal; ma. mandible; ma' malar; fi. "finger" at end of trunk; c. cervical vertebrae; d. dorsal vertebrae; pa. pelvis; sc. scapula; st. sternum; hu. humerus; ul. ulna; ra. radius; mc. metacarpus; fe. femur; pa. patella; tib. tibia; fib. fibula; met. metatarsus.

rous or anisomerous dentition, the transverse ridges of the molars being three to five, the same on all the teeth, continuous, and the valleys filled with cement. The genera are Elephas, Loxodon, and Stegodon, the last extinct.

elephantine (el'ē-fan'tin), a. [= F. elephantinus = Sp. It. elefantino = Pg. elefantino, < L. elephantinus, elephantine, also of ivory, < Gr. ἐλεφαντινος, of ivory, < ἐλέφας (ēlēfant), elephant, ivory: see elephant.] 1. Pertaining to the elephant; resembling an elephant.

With turcoles divinely blue (Though doubts arise where first they grew,
Whether casted elephantine bone
By minrals ting'd, or native stone).

Sir W. Jones, The Enchanted Fruit.

Hence—2. Elephant-like; huge; immense; heavy; clumsy; as, he was of elephantine proportions; elephantine movements.

But what insolent familiar dust have mated Thomas Coventry?—whose person was a quadrate, his step massy and elephantine.
Lamb, Old Benchers.

3. Made or consisting of ivory. See chryselephantine.—Elephantine books, in Rom. antiq., certain books consisting (originally) of ivory tablets, in which were registered the transactions of the senate, magistrates, emperors, and generals.—Elephantine epoch, in geol., the period during which there was a preponderance of large pachyderms.

elephant-leg (el'ē-fant-leg), n. Pachydermia of the leg; Barbados leg. See pachydermia.

elephant-mouse (el'ē-fant-mous), n. Same as elephant-shrew.

elephantoid (el'ē-fan'toid), a. and n. [Gr. ἐλεφαντοειδής, elephant, + ειδής, form.] I. a. Having the form of an elephant.

II. n. An elephantid.

elephantoidal (el'ē-fan-toi'dal), a. Same as elephantoid.

Elephantopus (el'ē-fan'tō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλεφαντόπους, ivory-footed (NL. taken in sense of 'elephant's-foot'), < ἐλέφας (ēlēfant), elephant, ivory.] 1. A genus of herbaceous vernoniaceous composites of America, of a dozen species, one of which (E. scaber) is a common weed in most tropical countries. Three species occur within the United States. Some Brazilian species are reputed to have medicinal properties.

2. A genus of aculephs. Lisson, 1843.

elephantous (el'ē-fan'tus), a. [Gr. ἐλεφαντινός + -ous.] Pertaining to or of the nature of elephantiasis: as, the elephantous group of specific inflammations. Quain, Med. Diet., p. 1432.

elephant-seal (el'ē-fant-sēl), n. Same as seal-elephant.

elephant's-ear (el'ē-fants-ēr), n. A common name for plants of the genus Begonia, from the form of their leaves.

elephant's-foot (el'ē-fants-fūt), n. 1. A book-name for species of Elephantopus, of which the word is a translation.—2. Testudinaria elephantipes, a plant of the natural order Dioscoreaceae.

elephant-shrew (el'ē-fant-shrō), n. A small mouse-like saltatorial insectivorous quadruped of Africa; one of the animals of the family Macroscelidæ or Rhynchocyonidæ. In superficial aspect they resemble some of the jumping-mice or kangaroo-nice, especially of the American genera Zapus and Dipodomys, having long hind limbs, well-developed ears, and the snout so long and sharp as to resemble a proboscis, whence the name. Also called elephant-mouse and proboscis-rat.

Elephant-shrew (Macroscelides typicus).

elephant's-tusk (el'ē-fants-tusk), n. A mol-lusk, Dentalium arcuatum, one of the tooth-shells.

Elephas (el'ē-fas), n. [NL., < L. elephas, < Gr. ἐλέφας, elephant: see elephant.] The typical genus of elephants, formerly embracing both the living species, or genera, now sometimes restricted to the type represented by the Asiatic elephant, Elephas indicus. In this restricted sense it is the same as Elasmodon and Euclephas. See cuts under elephant.

Elettaria (ele-tā-rī-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐλετάρια, Indian genus of scitamineous plants, of only one or two species. E. Cardamomum furnishes the cardamom-seeds of commerce. See cardamom.]

Eleusine (el'ū-sī-nē), n. [NL., appar. in reference to Eleusis (?): see Eleusinian.] A genus of grasses, belonging to the tribe Chlorideæ, having several linear spikes digitate at the summit of the culm. The species are natives of the warmer parts of the globe, and several are cultivated for their grain. In the East an Indian species, E. coracina (known as natchnee, nagla ragee, mand, and murua), is cultivated as a corn, from which the Tibetans make a weak beer. E. stricta is also a productive grain, and the Abyssinian grain tocusso is the product of another species, E. Tocusso. E. Indica, an annual species, is now naturalized in most warm countries, and is good for grazing and soiling, and as hay.

Eleusinia (el'ū-sin-i-ā), n. pl. [L., < Gr. Ἐλευσινία, neut. pl. of Ἐλευσινίος, pertaining to Eleusis, < Ἐλευσίς (Eleusis), Eleusis.] In Gr. antiq., the famous Athenian mysteries and festival of Eleusis, symbolizing the various phases of human life in the light of philosophic views as to its eternity, and honoring Demeter (Ceres), Cora (Proserpina), and the local Attic divinity Iacchos (Ἰακχος) as the especial protectors of agriculture and of all fruitfulness, and the guardians of Athens. Eleusinia, introduced from Athens, were also celebrated in other parts of Greece and Greek lands. See Eleusinian.—Great Eleusinia, the chief annual festival in honor of Demeter and Cora, celebrated at Athens and Eleusis from the 13th to the 23d of Boedromion (September–October).—Lesser Eleusinia, an annual festival at Athens, held as a prelude to the Great Eleusinia in the middle of the month of Anthesterion (February–March).

Eleusinian (el-ū-sin'-i-an), a. [L. Eleusinius, < Gr. Ἐλευσίνιος, pertaining to Eleusis: see Eleusinia.] Relating to Eleusis in Attica, Greece: as, the Eleusinian mysteries and festival, the mysteries and festival of Demeter (Ceres), celebrated at Eleusis.

Eleuthera bark. Same as cascarilla bark (which see, under *bark*²).

Eleutherata (e-lū-the-rā'tā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἑλευθερά, free, + *-ata*².] A term used by Fabricius (1775) to designate beetles, the insects which now form the order Coleoptera.

eleutherian (el-ū-thē'-ri-an), a. [Gr. ἑλευθέριος, like a free man, frank, freely giving, bountiful (ἑλευθερία, freedom), < ἑλευθερος, free.] Freely giving; bountiful; liberal.

And eleutherian Jove will bless their flight.
Glover, Leonidas, i.

Eleutheroblastea (e-lū'the-rō-blas'tē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἑλευθερος, free, + βλαστός, germ.] An order of hydroid hydrozoans, or a suborder of the order Hydrozoa and class Hydrozoa, represented by the common fresh-water hydra, Hydra viridis, of the family Hydridae. The animals have a hydriform trophosome and no medusoid buds, both generative products being developed within the body-wall of the single polypite of which the hydrosome consists. It is the lowest and simplest grade of hydrozoans, and contains the only fresh-water forms.

eleutheroblastic (e-lū'the-rō-blas'tik), a. Of or pertaining to the Eleutheroblastea.

eleutherobranchiate (e-lū'the-rō-brang'ki-āt), a. [NL., < Gr. ἑλευθερος, free, + βράγχια, gills.] Having free gills; of or relating to the Eleutherobranchii.

Eleutherobranchii (e-lū'the-rō-brang'ki-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἑλευθερος, free, + βράγχια, gills.] A primary group of fishes, having the gills free at the outer edge, and thus contrasted with the selachians and the myzonts. It includes all the true or teleostomous fishes. [Not in use.]

Eleutherodactyli (e-lū'the-rō-dak'ti-lī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἑλευθερος, free, + δάκτυλος, finger, toe.] In ornith., those Passeres which have the hind toe perfectly free, as is the case with all Passeres except the Eurylamidae or Desmodactyli (which see). The character is made a basis of the primary division of Passeres. Forbes.

eleutherodactylous (e-lū'the-rō-dak'ti-lus), a. Having the characters of the Eleutherodactyli.

eleutheromania (e-lū'the-rō-mā'ni-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑλευθερος, free (ἑλευθερία, freedom), + μανία, madness.] A mania for freedom; excessive zeal for freedom. [Rare.]

Our Peers have, in too many cases, laid aside their frogs, laces, bagwigs; and go about in English costume, or ride rising in their stirrups, in the most headlong manner; nothing but insubordination, eleutheromania, confused unlimited opposition in their heads.
Caryl, French Rev., i. iii. 4.

eleutheromaniac (e-lū'the-rō-mā'ni-ak), a. and n. [eleutheromania + -ac; cf. maniac.] I. a. Having an excessive zeal for freedom.

Crowds, as was said, inundate the outer courts: inundation of young eleutheromaniac Noblemen in English costume, uttering audacious speeches.
Caryl, French Rev., i. iii. 4.

II. n. One having an excessive zeal for freedom; a fanatic on the subject of freedom.

eleutheropetalous (e-lū'the-rō-pet'al-us), a. [Gr. ἑλευθερος, free, + πέταλον, a leaf (in mod. bot. a petal), + -ous.] In bot., having the petals distinct; polypetalous.

eleutherophyllous (e-lū'the-rō-fil'us), a. [Gr. ἑλευθερος, free, + φύλλον = L. folium, a leaf, + -ous.] In bot., composed of separate leaves: applied to a calyx or corolla, or to the perianth as a whole.

Eleutheropomi (e-lū'the-rō-pō'mī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἑλευθερος, free, + πόμα, a lid.] A suborder of chondropterygian fishes, in which the gills are free. The sturgeons and chimæras were grouped together by Duméril under this title. [Not in use.]

eleutherosepalous (e-lū'the-rō-sep'al-us), a. [Gr. ἑλευθερος, free, + NL. sepalum, sepal, + -ous.] In bot., composed of distinct sepals; polysepalous.

Eleutherurus (e-lū'the-rō'rū-s), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑλευθερος, free, + οὐρά, tail.] A genus of fruit-eating bats, of the family Pteropodidae, so called from having the tail free from the interfemoral membrane. E. aegyptiacus is a species frequently sculptured on Egyptian monuments.

elevate (el'ē-vāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. elevated, ppr. elevating. [L. elevatus, pp. of elevare (> It. elevare = Sp. Pg. elevar = F. élever), raise, lift up, < e, ex, out, + levare, make light, lift, < levis, light: see levity, lever. Cf. alleviate.] 1. To move or cause to move from a lower to a higher level, place, or position; raise; lift; lift up: as, to elevate the host in the service of the mass; to elevate the voice.

Dwarf, bear my shield; squire, elevate my lance.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, iii. 2.
In every endeavour to elevate ourselves above reason, we are seeking to elevate ourselves above the atmosphere with wings which cannot soar but by beating the air.
J. Martineau.

You remember the high stool on which culprits used to be elevated with the tall paper fool's-cap on their heads, blushing to the ears.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 241.

2. To raise to a higher state or station; exalt; raise from a low, common, or primary state, as by training or education; raise from or above low conceptions: as, to elevate a man to an office; to elevate the character.

Honours that tended to elevate a body of people into a distinct species from the rest of the nation. Shenstone.

A grandeur, a simplicity, a breadth of manner, an imagination at once elevated and restrained by the subject, reign throughout Milton's Ode on the Nativity.
Hallam, Introd. Lit. of Europe, iii. 5.

The competence of man to elevate and to be elevated is in that desire and power to stand in joyful and ennobling intercourse with individuals, which makes the faith and the practice of all reasonable men. Emerson, Domestic Life.

3. To excite; cheer; animate: as, to elevate the spirits.
Nor. Or art thou mad?
Clarin. A little elevated.
With the assurance of my future fortune:
Why do you stare and grin?
Massinger, Parliament of Love, ii. 1.

When men take pleasure in feeling their minds elevated by strong drink, and so indulge their appetite as to destroy their understandings, . . . their case is much to be pitied.
John Woolman, Journal (1756), p. 93.

Hence—4. To intoxicate slightly; render somewhat tipsy. [Colloq.]
His depth of feeling is misunderstood; he is supposed to be a little elevated, and nobody heeds him.
Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, ix.

5. To make light or unimportant; diminish the weight or importance of.
The Arabian physicians, . . . not being able to deny it to be true of the holy Jesus, endeavour to elevate and lessen the thing by saying it is not wholly beyond the force of nature that a virgin should conceive.
Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, i. 4.

Disclosed elevated. See disclosed.—Elevated railroad. See railroad.—Elevating arc. See arc.—Syn. 1. To lift up, uplift.—2. To promote, ennoble.—1-3. Lift, exalt, etc. See raise.

elevate (el'ē-vāt), a. [ME. elevat; < L. elevatus, pp. of elevare] Raised; elevated. [Poetical and rare.]
And in a region elevate and high,
And by the form wherein it [a comet] did appear,
As the most skillful seriously divine,
Foreshadow'd a kingdom shortly to decline.
Drayton, Baron's Wars, i.

On each side an imperial city stood,
With towers and temples proudly elevate
On seven small hills.
Milton, P. R., iv. 34.

elevatedness (el'ē-vā-ted-nes), n. The state of being elevated.
I had neither wife nor children, in whom mutually to reflect and see reflected the elevatedness and generosity of my station.
Godwin, St. Leon.

elevating-screw (el'ē-vā-ting-skro), n. A screw by means of which the breech of a piece of ordnance is adjusted for the elevation or vertical direction of the piece.

Egyptian Free-tailed Bat (Eleutherurus aegyptiacus).

elevatio (el-ē-vā'shi-ō), n. [L.: see elevation.]

1. In anc. music, a raising of the voice; arsis.

2. In medieval music, the extension of a mode beyond its usual compass or ambitus.

elevation (el-ē-vā'shon), n. [ME. elevacioun, < OF. elevation, F. élévation = Pr. eslevation, eslevation = Sp. elevacion = Pg. elevação = It. elevazione, < L. elevatio(-n-), a lifting up, < elevare, lift up, elevate: see elevate.] 1. The act of elevating or raising from a lower level, place, or position to a higher.

I hope a proper elevation of voice, a due emphasis and accent, are not to come within this description.
Steele, Spectator, No. 147.

I can add nothing to the accounts already published of the elevation of the land at Valparaiso which accompanied the earthquake of 1822.
Darwin, Geol. Observations, ii. 245.

2. The state of being raised or elevated; exaltation; specifically, exaltation of feeling or spirits.

Different elevations of spirit unto God are contained in the name of prayer.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 48.

His style was an elegant perspicuity, rich of phrase, but seldom any bold metaphors; and so far from tumid, that it rather wanted a little elevation.
Sir H. Wotton.

I fancied I could distinguish an elevation of spirit different from that which is the cause or the effect of simple jollity.
Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 115.

Hence—3. A state of slight inebriation; tipsiness. [Colloq.]—4. That which is raised or elevated; an elevated place; a rising ground; a height.

His [Milton's] poetry reminds us of the miracles of Alpine scenery. Nooks and dells, beautiful as fairyland, are embosomed in its most rugged and gigantic elevations.
Macaulay, Milton.

5. Altitude. (a) In astron., the distance of a heavenly body above the horizon, or the arc of a vertical circle intercepted between it and the horizon. (b) In gunn., the angle which the axis of the bore makes with the plane of the horizon. (c) In dialing, the angle which the style makes with the substylar line. (d) In topog.: (1) Height; the vertical distance above the sea-level or other surface of reference. (2) The angle at which anything is raised above a horizontal direction.

Tak ther the elevation of thy pool, and eke the latitude of thy region.
Chaucer, Astrolabe, ii. § 23.

6. In arch., a geometrical representation of a building or part of a building or other structure in vertical projection—that is, of its upright parts.—7. Eccles., the act of raising the eucharistic elements after consecration and before communion, in sign of oblation to God, or in order to show them to the people. With reference to the latter purpose especially, this act is also known as the ostension. The act of elevation before God and that of ostension to the people are, however, in many liturgies not coincident.

The priests were singing, and the organ sounded, And then anon the great cathedral bell, It was the elevation of the Host.
Longfellow, Spanish Student, i. 3.

8. In the Rom. Cath. liturgy, a musical composition, vocal or instrumental, performed in connection with the elevation of the host.—Altitude or elevation of the pole. See altitude.—Angle of elevation, in ordnance, the angle which the axis of the gun makes with a line passing through its sights and the target.—Elevation bell. See bell.—Elevation of the panagia. See panagia.—Geometric elevation, a design for the front or side of a building drawn according to the rules of geometry, as opposed to perspective or natural elevation.—Syn. 1. Lifting, lifting up, uplifting, improvement.—2. Eminence, loftiness, superiority, refinement.

elevator (el'ē-vā-tor), n. [= F. éleveur = Sp. elevador = It. elevatore, < LL. elevator, one who raises up, a deliverer, < L. elevare, lift up; see elevate.] 1. One who or that which raises, lifts, or exalts. Specifically—2. In anat.: (a) A muscle which raises a part of the body, as the lip or eyelid: same as levator. (b) Same as extensor. [Rare.]

There appear, at first, to be but three elevators, or extensors [of the digits], but practically each segment [phalanx] has its elevator.
Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 50.

3. A surgical instrument used for raising a depressed or fractured part of the skull. Also called elevatory.—4. In mech., a hoisting apparatus; a lift. (a) A car or cage for lifting and lowering passengers or freight in a hoistway; in a broad sense, the entire hoisting apparatus, including the shaft or well, the cage, and the motor. See hoisting-engine. (b) A structure for storing grain in bulk, including the grain-lifters and conveyers. In such elevators the elevator proper, or lifter, is a continuous band of leather studded with metal cups or elevator-buckets, passing over a pulley at the top of the building and under a second pulley on the elevator-boot, or the foot of an inclosed tube called the elevator-leg (see leg). In some instances the elevator-leg is pivoted at the top, so that it may swing clear of the building and reach into the hold of the vessel or car to be emptied. The structure itself consists of a nest of deep bins, into which the grain is directed by spouts from the top of the lifter. The capacity of such elevators is often one and a half million bushels or more. For the horizontal movement of grain in elevators, conveyers are used. Lifting elevators are also used in flour-mills, grinding-mills, furnaces, and other works, to handle materials of all kinds in bulk, as sand, ashes, ice, etc.

5. A building containing one or more mechanical elevators, especially a warehouse for the storage of grain. [U. S.] — Autodynamic elevator. See autodynamic. — Elevator case, a noted case before the United States Supreme Court in 1876 (Munn vs. Illinois, 94 U. S., 113), in which it was decided that, notwithstanding the exclusive power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce, a State may, for the public good, regulate the manner in which citizens shall use their property when devoted by them to a use in which the public have an interest: so called because sustaining the validity of a statute limiting grain-elevator tolls. — Elevator-engine. See engine. — Floating elevator, an elevator erected on a boat for lifting, transferring, or storing grain. Such elevators are used to transfer grain from barges to the holds of ships. — Hydraulic elevator, an elevator operated by some kind of hydraulic apparatus. For short lifts the hydraulic press is sometimes used, particularly where the weight to be raised is great. Another form, for light loads and moderate heights, is a telescopic tube supporting the car at the upper end. On filling the tube with water under pressure it expands and raises the car; to lower it, the supply of water is cut off, and that in the tube is allowed to escape. The most common form of hydraulic elevator in the United States is that of a car lifted by ropes, operated by a piston in a long cylinder. The rope is connected directly with the piston-rod, which is moved by the admission of water under pressure. In some instances the cylinder is horizontal and the travel of the piston limited, multiplying gear being fitted to the rope. The usual form is an upright cylinder with a very simple form of rope-gearing. — Pneumatic elevator, a hoisting or lifting apparatus worked by compressed air; a pneumatic hoist.

elévatory (el'ē-vā-tō-ri), a. and n. [= F. élévatoire = It. elevatorio, < NL. elevatorius*, < LL. elevator, elevator: see elevator, elate.] 1. Raising or tending to raise; having power to elevate.

Channels are almost universally present within the fringing reefs of those islands which have undergone recent elévatory movements. Darwin, Coral Reefs, p. 73.

Among these elévatory, and therefore reparative, agents, the most important place must be assigned to earthquakes and volcanoes. Huxley, Physiography, p. 186.

II. n.; pl. elévatories (-riz). Same as elevator, 3.

élève (ā-lev'), n. [F., < élever, raise, bring up, educate, < L. elevare, raise: see elate.] A pupil; one brought up, educated, or trained by another.

eleven (ē-lev'n), a. and n. [ME. elieven, enleven, enleven, enleve, elieven, elieve, enleve, etc., < AS. endleofan, endlifon, endlifon (= OS. elef, elefan, eleven, elefan = OFries. andlova, andlova, andlova = D. elf = LG. elve, ölve, ölven = OHG. einlif, MHG. einlif, einlif, elief, elief, elief, elief, elief = Icel. ellif, later ellefu, = Sw. elfva = Dan. élleve = Goth. ainlif], eleven, orig. ainlif* (the first syllable (end-, < an) having been modified by shortening and mutation with dissimilated gemination of n to nd, and the last syllable (-an, -on) added as a quasi-plural suffix), < an (= Goth. ain, etc.), one, + -lif, an element appearing also in Goth. twalif = AS. twelf, E. twelve, etc. (see twelve), and appar. = Lith. -lika, in venolika, eleven, where the element is by some supposed to stand for dika* = Gr. dēka = L. decem = E. ten, making the Teut. and Lith. forms exactly cognate with L. undecim, eleven, < unus = E. one, + decem = E. ten.] 1. a. One more than ten: a cardinal numeral beginning the second decade: as, eleven men.

The game [shovel-board], when two play, is generally eleven; but the number is extended when four or more are jointly concerned. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 395.

II. n. 1. The number which is the sum of ten and one.—2. A symbol representing eleven units, as 11, or XI., or xi.—3. A team or side in cricket or foot-ball: so called because regularly consisting of eleven players: as, the Philadelphia eleven; there were two strong elevens matched.

eleven-o'clock-lady (ē-lev'n-o-klok-lā'di), n. [Tr. F. dame d'once heures.] The star-of-Bethlehem, Ornithogalum umbellatum.

eleventh (ē-lev'nth), a. and n. [ME. elleventhe, ellevend, eleventhe, endlefte, enlefte, etc., < AS. endliftha (= OS. elifta = OFries. ellefta, elefta, alfta, andlofta = D. elfde = OHG. einlifto, MHG. einlifte, einlifte, elifte, elifte = Icel. ellifiti, mod. ellifiti = Dan. ellevte = Sw. elfte, eleventh: as eleven (AS. endleofan, etc.) + -th, the ordinal suffix: see -th.] 1. a. 1. Next in order after the tenth: an ordinal number.

But about the eleventh hour he went out and founde other stondeynge, and he seide to hem, what stondeyn ye idel here al dai? Wyclif, Mat. xx.

2. Constituting one of eleven equal parts into which anything is divided: as, the eleventh part of fifty-five is five.—At the eleventh hour, at the last moment; just before it is too late: in allusion to the parable of the laborers in the vineyard. Mat. xx. 1-16.

II. n. 1. One of eleven equal parts; the quotient of unity divided by eleven: as, five elevenths of fifty-five are twenty-five.

The crysopraxe the tenth is tygt;
The lacygh the eleventhe gent.

Aliterative Poems (ed. Morris), i. 1013.

2. In early Eng. law, an eleventh part of the rents of the year, or of movables, or both, granted or levied by way of tax.—3. In music: (a) The interval between any tone and a tone on the eleventh diatonic degree above or below it; a compound fourth, or an octave and a fourth. (b) A tone distant by an eleventh from a given tone.

elf (elf), n.; pl. elves (elvz). [Early mod. E. also elfe; < ME. elf, elife, alfe, pl. elvene, alvene, < AS. elf, pl. ylfe, m., alfen, elfen, in a very early form albin (usually in comp.), m., an elf, sprite, fairy, incubus, = MD. alf, D. elf = MLG. alp, LG. elf = OHG. alp, MHG. alp (alb-), pl. elbe, and G. alp, m., MHG. elbe, f. (G. elf, m., elbe, f., < E. elf), = Icel. álfr = Sw. alf, m., elfva, f., elf (in comp.), pl. elfvor = Dan. alf, elver (in comp.), an elf: a common Teut. word; ult. origin unknown. From the Icel. form álfr, formerly álfr, is the doublet auf, awf, also written auph, ouph, and usually aaf, q. v., now discriminated in senses. See ert-king.] 1. An imaginary being superstitiously supposed to inhabit unfrequented places, and in various ways to affect mankind; a sprite; a fairy; a goblin. Elves are usually imagined as diminutive trickys beings in human form, given to capricious interference, either kindly or mischievous, in human affairs.

This was the old opinion as I rede,—
I speke of manye hundred yeres ago,—
But now kan no man se none elves mo.

Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 6.

Every elf, and fairy sprite,
Hop as light as bird from brier.

Shak., M. N. D., v. 2.

The elves also,
Whose light eyes glow
Like the sparks of fire, befriend thee.
Herrick, Night-Piece to Julia.

2. A mischievous or wicked person; a knave; a rogue.

Bid him, without more ado,
Surrender himself, or else the proud elf
Shall suffer with all his crew.

Robin Hood and the Valiant Knight (Child's Ballads, [V. 389].)

Spite of all the criticising elves,
Those who would make us feel, must feel themselves.
Churchill, The Rosciad, l. 961.

3. A diminutive person; a dwarf; hence, a pet name for a child, especially one who is very sprightly and graceful.—syn. 1. Sprite, hobgoblin, imp.—3. Urchin, dwarf.—1 and 3. Fay, Gnome, etc. See fairy.

elf (elf), v. t. [< elf, n., in allusion to the mischievousness ascribed to elves. Cf. elf-lock.] To entangle intricately, as the hair. [Rare.]

My face I'll grime with filth;
Blanket my loins; elf all my hair in knots.

Shak., Lear, ii. 3.

elf-arrow (elf'ar'ō), n. Same as elf-bolt.

elf-bolt (elf'bōlt), n. An arrow-head of flint or other stone found among paleolithic remains: so called from the supposition that they were fairy arrow-heads. Also elf-arrow, elf-dart, elf-shot, elf-stone.

elf-child (elf'child), n. A child supposed to have been substituted by elves for one which they had stolen; a changeling.

elf-dart (elf'dart), n. Same as elf-bolt.

elf-dock (elf'dok), n. See dock, 2.

elf-fire (elf'fir), n. A common name for ignis fatuus.

elfin (elf'in), n. and a. [An artificial (poetical) form, first used by Spenser; in form as if an adj. (for elfen*, < elf + -en), but it first appears as a noun, and in def. 2 is appar. regarded as diminutive. Cf. AS. elfen, elfen, albin (usually in comp.) (= MHG. elbinne, a fairy, nymph, fem. of elf, an elf; see elf).] 1. n. 1. An elf; an inhabitant of fairy-land: in Spenser applied to his knights.

He was an Elfin borne of noble state
And mickle worship in his native land.
Spenser, F. Q., II. i. 6.

2. A little urchin or child. [Playful.]

For she was just, and friend to virtuous lore,
And pass'd much time in truly virtuous deed;
And in those elfins' ears would oft deplore
The times, when truth by Popish rage did bleed.
Shenstone, The Schoolmistress, st. 15.

=Syn. See fairy, n.

II. a. Relating or pertaining to elves.

The mightiest chiefs of British song
Scorned not such legends to prolong:
They gleam through Spenser's elfin dream,
And mix in Milton's heavenly theme.

Scott, Marmion, Int., i.

Excalibur, . . . rich

With jewels, elfin Urim, on the hilt.

Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

Elfin pipe. See fairy pipes, under fairy.

elfish, elvish (el'fish, -vish), a. [ME. elvisch, elvisch, alviso (= MHG. elvisch); < elf + -ish.] 1. Of or pertaining to elves or to elf-land; of the nature of an elf; caused by or characteristic of elves; peevish; spiteful: as, an elfish being; elfish mischief.

O, spite of spites!

We talk with goblins, owls, and elvish sprites;

If we obey them not, this will ensue,

They'll suck our breath, or pinch us black and blue.

Shak., C. of E., ii. 2.

I watched the water-snakes; . . .

And when they reared, the elfish light

Fell off in hoary flakes.

Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, iv.

2. Distracted or bewitched by elves; distraught or abstracted, as if bewitched.

He semeth elvissh by his countenance,

For unto no wight doth he daliance.

Chaucer, Sir Thopas, Prolog., l. 13.

elfishly, elvishly (el'fish-i, -vish-li), adv. In the manner of elves; mischievously.

She had been heard talking, and singing, and laughing most elvishly, with the invisibles of her own race.

Scott, Peveril of the Peak, xvi.

elfkin (elf'kin), n. [< elf + dim. -kin.] A little elf.

elf-king (elf'king), n. [= D. elfenking = Dan. elverkong.] The king of the elves or fairies.

elf-land (elf'land), n. The region of the elves; fairy-land.

The horns of Elf-land faintly blowing.

Tennyson, Princess, iii.

elf-lock (elf'lok), n. A knot of hair twisted by elves; a knot twisted as if by elves; hence, in the plural, hair in unusual disorder.

This is that very Mab,
That plats the manes of horses in the night,
And bakes the elf-locks in foul sluttish hairs,
Which, once untangled, much misfortune bodes.

Shak., R. and J., i. 4.

You will pull all into a knot or elf-lock; which nothing but the shears or a candle will undo.

B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, Ind.

Ragged elf-locks hanging down to the breast.

R. F. Burton, El-Medina, p. 319.

elf-locked (elf'lokt), a. Wearing elf-locks; with disheveled or tangled hair. [Poetical.]

The elfe-lock fury all her snakes had shed.

Sir R. Stapleton, tr. of Juvenal, vii. 83.

elf-queen (elf'kwēn), n. [ME. elfqueen; < elf + queen.] The queen of the elves or fairies.

The elfqueene with hir joly compaignye

Daunced ful ofte in many a grene meade.

Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 4.

elf-shot (elf'shot), a. Shot by an elf.

There, every herd, by sad experience, knows
How, wing'd with fate, their elf-shot arrows fly,
When the sick ewe her summer food foregoes,
Or, stretch'd on earth, the heart-smit heifers lie.

Collins, Pop. Superstitions of the Highlands.

elf-shot (elf'shot), n. 1. Same as elf-bolt.

The Stone Arrow Heads of the old Inhabitants of this Island (that are sometimes found) are vulgarly supposed to be Weapons shot by Fairies at Cattle. They are called Elf-shots.

Bourne's Pop. Antiq. (1777), p. 117, note.

2. A disease supposed to be produced by the agency of elves. [Scotch.]

elf-skin (elf'skin), n. A word found only in the following passage, where it is probably a misprint for eel-skin (in allusion to Prince Henry's long and lank figure).

Pal. Away, you starveling, you elf-skin, you dried neat's-tongue.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 4.

elf-stone (elf'stōn), n. Same as elf-bolt.

elger (el'gér), n. [E. dial., < ME. elger, elyer (= MD. aelgeher, elgeher, D. aalgeer), ult. < AS. æl, eel, + gār, spear: see gar, gore.] An eel-spear. Prompt. Parv., p. 138. [Local, Eng.]

Elgin marbles. See marble.

Eliaç (ē-li-ak), a. Pertaining to Elis, an ancient city of the Greek Peloponnesus. Also Elean. — Eliaç school, a school of philosophy founded in Elis by Phedus, a scholar and favorite of Socrates. Its doctrines are conjectured to have been ethical, and somewhat apocryphal concerning the theory of cognition.

elicit (ē-lis'it), v. t. [L. elicitus, pp. of elicer, draw out, < e, out, + laccere, entice: see lace. Cf. allect.] To draw out; bring forth or to light; evolve; gain: as, to elicit sparks by collision; to elicit truth by discussion; to elicit approval.

From the words taken together such a sense must be elicited as will give a meaning to each word.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 254.

That may justly elicit the assent of reasonable men.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 129.

It is not the composition of the piece, but the number of starts and attitudes that may be introduced, that elicits applause.

Goldsmith, Vicar, xviii.

The inquiry at Stratham was calculated to elicit the truth.

D. Webster, Goodrich Case, April, 1817.

elicit (ē-lis'it), a. [< L. elicitus, pp.: see the verb.] 1. Immediately directed to an end: opposed to imperate.

To give aims is a proper and elicit act of charity.

Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, ii. 3.

2. Performed by the will itself without the aid of any other faculty; as, volition, nolition, choice, consent, and the like are elicit acts: opposed to imperate.

The schools dispute whether in morals the external action superadds anything of good or evil to the internal elicit act of the will.

South, Works, I. 3.

elicitate (ē-lis-i-tāt), v. t. [< elicit + *-ate*².] To elicit.

And make it strenge with light from forms innate.

Thus may a skillful man hid truth elicitate.

Dr. H. More, Sleep of the Soul, ii. 41.

elicitation (ē-lis-i-tā'shon), n. [< elicitate + -ion.] The act of eliciting, or of drawing out.

That elicitation which the schools intend is a deducing of the power of the will into act; that drawing which they mention is merely from the appetibility of the object.

Bp. Bramhall.

elide (ē-lid'), v. t.; pret. and pp. elided, ppr. eliding. [= Sp. Pg. elidir = It. elidere, < L. elidere, knock, strike, or dash out, force out, press out, in gram. (tr. Gr. ἐκθίψω: see ecthipsis) suppress (a vowel), < e, out, + ludere, strike, hurt by striking: see lesion. Cf. collide.] 1. To break or dash in pieces; crush.

Before we answer unto these things, we are to cut off that whereunto they from whom these objections proceed do oftentimes fly for defence and succour, when the force and strength of their arguments is elided.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iv. 4.

2. In gram., to suppress or slur over the sound of in speech, or note the suppression of in writing: technically applied especially to the cutting off of a final vowel, as in "th' enemy," but in a more general sense to that of a syllable or any part of a word. See elision, 1.

eligibility (el'i-ji-bil'i-ti), n. [< eligible: see -bility.] 1. Worthiness or fitness to be chosen; the state or quality of a thing which renders it desirable or preferable to another.

Sickness hath some degrees of eligibility, at least by an after-choice.

Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, vi. § 3.

2. Capability of being chosen to an office; the condition of being qualified to be chosen; legal qualification for election or appointment.

eligible (el'i-ji-bl), a. and n. [< OF. eligible, F. éligible = It. eligibile, *< ML. eligibilis, that may be chosen (in adv. compar. eligibilis), < L. eligere, choose: see elect.] 1. Fit to be chosen; worthy of choice; desirable: as, an eligible tenant.

Peace with men can never be eligible when it implies enmity with God.

Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xxiv.

While health endures, the latter part of life, in the eye of reason, is certainly the more eligible.

Steele, Spectator, No. 153.

Certainty, in a deep distress, is more eligible than suspense.

Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe.

Through tomes of fable and of dream

I sought an eligible theme.

Cowper, Annu Memorabilis, 1789.

2. Qualified to be chosen; legally qualified for election or appointment.

Among the Mundrucs, the possession of ten smoke-dried heads of enemies renders a man eligible to the rank of chief.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 350.

II. n. One who is qualified to be chosen or elected; an eligible person.

The certification of all the eligibles will result in what you have applauded.

The American, XII. 152.

eligibleness (el'i-ji-bl-nes), n. The state of being eligible; fitness to be chosen in preference to another; suitability; desirableness.

It [citizenship] embraced certain private rights, and certain political rights; these last being principally the right of suffrage, and eligibleness to office.

G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 49.

eligibly (el'i-ji-bl), adv. In an eligible manner; so as to be worthy of choice or capable of election.

eligmid (ē-lig'mid), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Eligmidæ.

Eligmidæ (ē-lig'mi-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Eligmus + -idæ.] A family of fossil bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Eligmus. They have a peculiar shell gaping behind the umbones and a special myophore for the adductor muscle. The species are peculiar to the Oolite. They are generally referred to the family Ostreidæ.

Eligmus (ē-lig'mus), n. [NL., prop. Heligmus*, < Gr. ἑλιγμός, a winding, rolling, convolution, < ἑλίσσω, wind, roll, turn: see helix.] The typical genus of Eligmidæ.

elimatē (el'i-māt or ē-lī-māt), v. t. [< L. elimatus, pp. of elimare, file, polish, < e, out, + limare, file, < lima, a file.] To render smooth; polish.

eliminable (ē-lim'i-nā-bl), a. [< L. eliminare, eliminate: see -able.] Capable of being eliminated.

Cumulative error, not eliminable by working in a circuit, may be caused when there is much nothing or nothing in the direction of the line.

Encyc. Brit., XXII. 707.

eliminant (ē-lim'i-nant), n. [< L. eliminan(-t)s, ppr. of eliminare, turn out of doors: see eliminate.] In math., a function of the coefficients of any number of homogeneous equations among the same number of unknown quantities, such that the vanishing of it is the necessary and sufficient condition of the equations being consistent with one another. [The word was introduced by De Morgan. Many writers continue to use Bezout's word, resultant.]

eliminate (ē-lim'i-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. eliminated, ppr. eliminating. [< L. eliminatus, pp. of eliminare (> It. eliminare = Sp. Pg. eliminar = F. éliminer), turn out of doors, banish, < e, out, + limen (limin-), a threshold, akin to limes (limit-), a boundary: see limit.] 1. To go beyond the limit or limits of.

In thy wretched cloister thou Walkest thine own gray friar too;
Strict, and lock'd up, thou't hood all o'er,
And ne'er eliminat'st thy door.

Lovelace, The Snail.

2. To thrust out; remove, throw aside, or disregard as injurious, superfluous, irrelevant, or for any reason undesirable or unnecessary; expel; get rid of.

This detains secretions which nature finds it necessary to eliminate.

Med. Repos.

Now here the obvious method occurs of sifting the masses, so as to eliminate the worst elements and retain the best.

Prof. Blackie.

Scientific truths, of whatever order, are reached by eliminating perturbing or conflicting factors, and recognizing only fundamental factors.

H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 104.

3. In math., to remove (a quantity) from a system of equations by the reduction of the number of equations. Thus, if we have two equations expressing respectively the rates at which an orange growing on a tree increases in bulk and in weight, we can combine them so as to eliminate the time, and so obtain an equation expressing the relation between the bulk and the weight. To eliminate the personal equation. See equation. [The use of eliminate as a synonym of elicit, deduce, separate, etc., practised by some writers, is without justification.

Newton, . . . having eliminated the great law of the natural creation.

J. D. Morell.

To eliminate the real effect of art from the effects of the abuse.

Ruskin.]

elimination (ē-lim'i-nā'shon), n. [= F. élimination = Sp. eliminación = Pg. eliminação = It. eliminazione, < L. as if eliminatio*(n-), < eliminare, thrust out of doors: see eliminate.] 1. A thrusting out; the act of removing, throwing aside, or disregarding; expulsion; riddance.

The preparatory step of the discussion was, therefore, an elimination of those less precise and appropriate significations which, as they would at best only afford a remote genus and difference, were wholly incompetent for the purpose of a definition.

Sir W. Hamilton.

By means of researches on different coloured light it is now ascertained that those rays which cause the liveliest elimination of oxygen belong to the less refrangible half of the spectrum.

Lommel, Light (trans.), p. 196.

2. In law, the act of banishing or turning out of doors; ejection.—3. In math., the process of reducing a number of equations containing certain quantities to a smaller number, in which one or more of the quantities shall not be found.—Dialytic elimination. See dialytic.—Euler's method of elimination, a method of eliminating an unknown quantity between two equations of the *m*th and *n*th degrees respectively, which consists in multiplying the first by an indeterminate expression of the (n—1)th degree and the second by an indeterminate expression of the (m—1)th degree, and equating separately the m + n terms so obtained. The determinant expressing their compatibility is the eliminant required.

eliminative (ē-lim'i-nā-tiv), a. [< eliminate + -ive.] Pertaining to or effecting elimination; specifically, excretory.

Eliminative or excretory tissues represented by cells in the kidneys, skin, etc.

H. N. Martin, Human Body (3d ed.), p. 30.

eliminator (ē-lim'i-nā-tor), n. [< eliminate + -or.] One who or that which eliminates, removes, or throws aside.

The lungs play a double part, being not merely eliminators of waste or excretory products, but importers into the economy of a substance which is not exactly either food or drink, but something as important as either—to wit, oxygen.

Huxley and Youmans, Physiol., § 29.

eliminatory (ē-lim'i-nā-tō-ri), a. [< eliminate + -ory.] Eliminative.

Chronic irritation set up in the eliminatory organs by the excretion of incompletely oxidized nitrogenous matter.

Med. News, LII. 294.

elinguatē (ē-ling'gwāt), v. t. [< L. elinguatus, pp. of elinguare, deprive of the tongue, < e, out, + lingua = E. tongue.] To cut out the tongue of.

The damned Doomes-man hath Him judg'd to death,
The Diu'll that Diu'll elinguat for his doome.

Davies, Holy Rood, p. 14.

elinguation (ē-ling-gwā'shon), n. [< L. elinguatio(n-), < L. elinguare, deprive of the tongue: see elinguatē.] In old Eng. law, the punishment of cutting out the tongue.

elinguid (ē-ling'gwīd), a. [With irreg. term. -id, < L. elinguis, without a tongue, speechless, < e, out, + lingua = E. tongue.] Tongue-tied; not having the power of speech. Coles.

Eliomys (ē-lī'ō-mis), n. [NL. (Wagner, 1843), < Gr. ἐλιός or ἐλεός, a kind of dormouse, Myoxus glis, + mys, mouse.] A genus of dormice, of the family Myoxidae, with distichous tufted tail and simple stomach. There are several species, the best-known of which, E. nitela, is the lerot, about 6 inches long.

eliquament (ē-lik'wā-ment), n. [< LL. as if eliquamentum*, < eliquare, clarify, strain: see eliquate.] A liquid expressed from fat, or from fat fish.

eliquate (el'i-kwāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. eliquated, ppr. eliquating. [< L. eliquatus, pp. of eliquare, cause to flow, pour forth, clarify, strain, < L. e, out, + liquare, melt, liquefy: see liquatē.] To separate, as one metal from another. See liquatē.

eliquation (el-i-kwā'shon), n. [< LL. eliquatio(n-), a liquefying, < eliquare, cause to flow freely, pour forth, clarify, strain: see eliquate.] See liquation.

Elis (ē'lis), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1804).] A genus of fossorial hymenopterous insects, of the family Scoliidae. The eyes are subreniform in both sexes, and the front wings have two recurrent nervures.

Elis quadrinotata, natural size.

They are large wasps of soliid habits, of which 9 North American and 6 European species are known. E. quadrinotata and E. plumipes inhabit the southern United States, where they have been found on cotton-plants.

elision (ē-lizh'on), n. [= F. élision = Sp. elision = Pg. elissão = It. elisione, elision, < L. elisio(n-), a striking or pressing out, in gram. (LL.) the suppression of a vowel (tr. Gr. ἐκθίψω: see ecthipsis), < elidere, pp. elidus, strike out, press out: see elide.] 1. A striking or cutting off; specifically, in gram., the cutting off or suppression of a vowel or syllable, naturally or for the sake of euphony or meter, especially at the end of a word when the next word begins with a vowel; more generally, the suppression of any part of a word in speech or writing: as, in "th' embattled plain" there is an elision of e; in "I'll not do it" there is an elision of vi.

The Italian is so full of Vowels, that it must ever be cumbered with Elisions. Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetry.

He has made use of several Elisions that are not customary among other English Poets.

Addison, Spectator, No. 285.
Nor praise I less that circumscription
By modern poets call'd elision,
With which, in proper station plac'd,
Thy polish'd lines are firmly brac'd.
Swift, The Dean's Answer to Sheridan.

2t. Division; separation.

The cause given of sound, that it would be an elision of the air, whereby, if they mean anything, they mean a cutting or dividing, or else an attenuating of the air, is but a term of ignorance.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 124.

elisor (ē-lī'zōr), n. [OF. elisor, elisior, elisour, eliseur, mod. F. eliseur, a chooser, < elire, mod. F. élire, < L. eligere, choose: see elite, v., elect.] In law, a sheriff's substitute in performing the duty of returning a jury, provided in some jurisdictions when the sheriff is interested in a suit.

These Elisors (of Preston) (called inhabitants only in the charter) are by a bye-law of 1742 required to be capital burgesses, and in-gild burgesses.

Municip. Corp. Report, 1835, p. 1686.

elitet, v. t. [ME. eliten (pp. elit), < OF. elit, eslit (F. élit), pp. of elire, eslire (F. élire), choose, < L. eligere, choose, elect: see elect. Cf. élite.] To choose; elect.

And though she be not swyfte, a strong one gete.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 136.

elitet, n. [Sc. also elyte (obs.); < ME. elite, < OF. elit, eslit, elected, pp. of elire, eslire, elect: see elite, v., and elect, v. and n.] One chosen; a person elected.

The pope wild not consent, he quassed ther elite.
Robert of Brunne, tr. of Langtoft's Chron. (ed. Hearne), p. 200.

élite (ā-lēt'), n. [F., < OF. eslite, < elire, eslire, F. élire, choose, pp. elit, eslit, élit, choice: see elite, and elect, v. and n.] A choice or select body; the best part: as, the élite of society.

elixir (ē-lik'sēr), v. t. [LL. elixare, boil thoroughly, seethe, < L. elixus, thoroughly boiled, seethed, < e, out, + lixare (rare), boil, < lix, ashes, lye.] To extract.

With a straine of fresh invention,
She might presse out the raritie of Art;
The pur'st elized juyce of rich conceit.
Marston, Antonio and Melinda, Prol.

elixate (ē-lik'sāt), v. t. [LL. elixatus, pp. of elixare, boil thoroughly: see elix.] To boil; seethe; extract by boiling. Richardson.

elixation (ē-lik-sā'shon), n. [= F. élixation = Sp. elijación = Pg. elização, < LL. as if elixatio* (n.), < elixare, pp. elixatus, boil thoroughly: see elixate.] The cooking, especially of meat, by boiling; extraction by boiling; also, concoction in the stomach; digestion.

Elization is the seething of meat in the stomach, by the said natural heat, as meat is boiled in a pot; to which corruption or putrefaction is opposite.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 20.

The flesh which was included five weeks ago was this day found very good. I do not doubt but that perfect elization was able to contribute something to its preservation, because the sundry principles of which flesh consisteth had, whilst the heat continued, exerted their strength upon one another far better than if, the flesh being less boiled, by reason of the great avolation of parts, had been removed from the fire, as happens in ordinary coctions.

Boyle, Second Contin. of Experiments, Art. xix., Exp. 3.

elixir (ē-lik'sēr), n. [Formerly also elixar; < ME. elixir = D. elixer = Sw. Dan. G. elixir, < OF. elixir, F. élixir = Pg. elixir = It. elisire, < Sp. elixir, elixir, < Ar. el iksir, the philosopher's stone: el, al, the; iksir, philosopher's stone, by some derived from kasara, break, break the edge, destroy, but prob. (like some other Ar. terms of alchemy: see alchemy, alembic, limbeck) of Gr. origin: < Gr. ξηρός, also ξηρός, dry, perhaps akin to χηρός, χηρός, dry: see Chersus, chersones.] 1. In alchemy, a soluble solid substance which was believed to have the property of transmuting baser metals into silver or gold and of prolonging life. The great elixir, also called the philosopher's stone, or the red tincture, when shaken in very small quantity into melted silver, lead, or other base metal, was said to transmute it into gold. In minute doses it was supposed to prolong life and restore youth, and was then called the elixir vitae. The lesser elixir, stone of the second class, or white tincture, was regarded as having these qualities in lesser degree; thus it transmuted baser metals into silver. The word is now often used figuratively.

A! nay! lat be; the philosophes stoou,
Elizir clept, we sechen faste echeon.
Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, 1. 310.

He that has once the flower of the sun,
The perfect ruby, which we call elixir, . . .
Can confer honour, love, respect, long life;
Give safety, valour, yea, and victory;
To whom he will. B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 1.

What enables me to perform this great work is the use of my Obsequium Catholicum, or the grand elixir, to support the spirits of human nature. Guardian, No. 11.

The air we breathed was an elixir of immortality.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 89.

2. In med., formerly, a tincture with more than one base; in modern pharmacy, an aromatic, sweetened, spirituous preparation containing small quantities of active medicinal substances. The first object sought in the modern elixir is an agreeable taste, and usually this is attained only by such sacrifices as to render the effect of the medicine almost nil. U. S. Dispensatory, p. 537.

3. The inmost principle; absolute embodiment or exemplification. [Rare or obsolete.]

She is not such a kind of evil as hath any good or use in it, which many evils have, but a distill'd quintessence, a pure elixir of mischief.

Milton, Church-Government, ii., Con.

A serenity and complacency . . . infinitely beyond the greatest bodily pleasures, the highest quintessence and elixir of worldly delights. South, Works, I. ii.

Elixir of vitriol, aromatic sulphuric acid; a mixture of sulphuric acid, cinnamon, ginger, and alcohol.—Elixir proprietatis, a decoction of aloes, saffron, and myrrh in vinegar. Commonly abbreviated elixir pro.

Paracelsus declared them an elixir made of aloes, saffron, and myrrh would prove a vivifying and preserving balsam, able to continue health and long life to its utmost limits; and hence he calls it by the lofty title of elixir of propriety to man; but concealed the preparation, in which Helmont asserts the alchemist is required.

P. Shaw, Chemistry, Process 81.

Elixir vitæ. See above, 1.—Elixir vitæ of Mathiolus, a compound of alcohol and upward of twenty aromatic and stimulating substances, at one time administered in epilepsy.

elixir (ē-lik'sēr), v. t. [elixir, n.] To give the character of an elixir to. [Rare.]

Yourself you have a good physician shown,

Lovelace, To Capt. Dudley Lovelace.

elixivate (ē-lik-siv'i-āt), v. t. [L. e, out, + E. livivate.] To livivate or refine thoroughly. Boyle.

elixivation (ē-lik-siv-i-ā'shon), n. [elixivate + -ion.] A complete or thorough process of livivation.

And by examining these substances by fit and proper ways, as also the cap. mort. by calcination, elixivation, and (if it will bear such a fire) vitrification.

Boyle, Works, IV. 800.

Elizabethan (ē-liz-a-beth'an), a. Of or pertaining to Elizabeth (daughter of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn), Queen of England from 1558 to 1603, or to her times.

A new crop of geniuses like those of the Elizabethan age may be born in this age, and, with happy heart and a bias for theism, bring asceticism, duty, and magnanimity into vogue again. Emerson, in N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 417.

Elizabethan architecture, a name given to the mixed or debased architecture of the times of Elizabeth and James I., when the worst forms of the Pointed and degenerate Italian styles were combined, producing a singular heterogeneousness in detail with, however, much picturesqueness in general effect. Its chief characteristics are: windows large, either in the plane of the wall or deeply embayed, long galleries, tall and highly decorated chimneys, and a profuse use of ornamental strapwork in pargular heterogeneousness in detail with, however, much picturesqueness in general effect. Its chief characteristics are: windows large, either in the plane of the wall or deeply embayed, long galleries, tall and highly decorated chimneys, and a profuse use of ornamental strapwork in parapets, window-heads, etc. The Elizabethan style is the last stage of the Tudor or Perpendicular, and, from its correspondence in period with the Renaissance of the continent, has sometimes been called the English Renaissance. The epithet Jacobean has been given to the latest variety of the Elizabethan, differing from the Elizabethan proper in showing a greater proportion of corrupt Italian forms.

The house was an admirable specimen of complete Elizabethan, a multitudinous cluster of gables and porches, oriels and turrets, screens of ivy and pinnacles of slate. H. James, Jr., Pass. Pilgrim, p. 47.

Elizabethan literature, the literature produced during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, which was one of the most prolific and well-marked periods of English literary activity. It was very remarkable for the variety, vigor, and permanent value of much of its prose and verse, and especially for the great number and productiveness of its dramatic writers. The two most eminent names in this literature are those of Francis Bacon, one of the greatest of philosophers, and William Shakspeare, the greatest of all dramatists.—Elizabethan type. Same as church text (which see, under church, a.).

elk¹ (elk), n. [*ME. elk (not found), irreg. < AS. elch (occurring once in a glossary of the 8th century, glossing L. tragelaphus) for elh*, with the reg. breaking colh* (cf. eola, glossing L. damma, deer, in the same glossary), = MD. elgh = OHG. elahō, elioh, elho, MHG. elhe, elch, G. elch, < Ice. elgr = Sw. elg = Norw. elg = Dan. els-dyr (for elgs-dyr*) = L. alces = Gr. ἄλκη (the L. and Gr. perhaps of Teut. origin), elk. D. eland, an elk (also, in South Africa, an eland), G. elend, elen, usually elen-thier (thier = E. deer, a beast), elk, are of other origin: see eland.] 1. Properly, the largest existing European and Elk (Alces malchis).

Asiatic species of the deer family, or Cervida, Alces malchis (formerly called Cervus alces). It stands when full-grown about 7 feet high at the withers, and bears enormous palmate antlers weighing sometimes 50 or 60 pounds. Its nearest living relative is the American moose.

2. In America, the wapiti, Cervus canadensis, a very different animal from the elk proper, representing the red deer or stag of Europe, C. elaphus. See wapiti and Alces.—3. In Asia, among the Anglo-Indians, some large rusine or rucervine deer or stag, as the sambar, Cervus aristotilis. These, like the wapiti of America, are related more or less nearly to the red deer or stag, and are quite unlike the true elk and the moose.

4. Same as eland, 1.—Elk park. See park.—Irish elk, the Cervus or Meagacerus hibernicus, a very large extinct elk, with enormous palmate antlers, the remains of which occur in the peat-bogs of Ireland.

elk² (elk), n. [E. dial., formerly also elke, ilke; ME. not found; perhaps a corruption of AS. elfetu, ylfete (for ylfetu*), earlier (Kentish) ael-bitu = OHG. alpiz, elbiz, MHG. elbez, a swan.] The wild swan, or hooper, Cygnus ferus. Montagu. [Local, Eng.]

In water black as Styx, swims the wild swan, the ilke. Of Hollanders so termed. Drayton, Polyolbion, xxv.

elk³ (elk), n. [Origin uncertain; It. elce, dial. (Sardinian) elithe = Pr. euze = F. yeuse, < L. illex (ilic), the holm-oak: see lex.] A kind of yow of which bows are made. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

Elkesaite, n. See Elcesaites.

elknut (elk'nūt), n. The Pyrolaria oleifera, a santalaceous shrub of the southern United States. Also called oilnut.

elk-tree (elk'trē), n. The sourwood or sorrel-tree of the United States, Oxydendrum arbo-reum.

elkwood (elk'wūd), n. The umbrella-tree, May-nolia Umbrella, of the southern United States, a small tree with soft, light, close-grained wood.

ell¹ (el), n. [ME. elle, elne, < AS. eln, an ell (18, 20½, 24, etc., inches), = D. el, elle = OHG.

elina, elna, MHG. eline, elne, ellen, G. elle = Icel. alín = Sw. aln = Dan. alen = Goth. aleina (for alina?*), an ell, whence It. aula, F. aune, an ell; orig. the forearm (as in AS. eln-boga, E. elbow) = L. ulna, the forearm, the elbow, an ell, = Gr. ὑλὴν, the forearm: see elbow, ulna.] A long measure, chiefly used for cloth. The English ell, not yet obsolete, is a yard and a quarter, or 45 inches. This unit seems to have been imported from France under the Tudors; and a statute of 1409 recognizes no difference between the ell (aune) and the yard (verge). The Scotch ell was 37 Scotch inches, or 37.0958 English inches. The so-called Flemish ell differed in different places, but averaged 27.4 English inches. Other well-attested ells were the following: ell of Austria, 30.676 English inches; of Bavaria, 32.702 inches; of Bremen, 22.773 inches; of Cassel, 22.424 inches; of France, 47.245 inches; of Poland, 22.650 inches; of Prussia, 26.259 inches; of Saxony, 22.257 inches; of Sweden, 23.378 inches. The ell of Holland is now the meter. See cubit, pik, endazeh, kut, braccio, khaleh.

He was, I must tell you, but seven foot high,

And, may be, an ell in the waste.

Robin Hood and Little John (Child's Ballads, V. 221).

O, here's a wit of cheveler that stretches from an inch narrow to an ell broad!

Shak., R. and J., II. 4.

She [the world] boasts a kernel, and bestows a shell;

Performs an inch of her fair promise's ell.

Quarles, Emblems, I. 7.

ell², el² (el), n. [*< ME. el, < AS. el, < L. el, the name of the letter L, < e, the usual assistant vowel, + -l; a L. formation, the Gr. name being ἑλῦδα.] 1. The name of the letter L, l. It is rarely so written, the symbol being used instead.—2. An addition to or wing of a house which gives it the shape of the capital letter L.—3. A pipe-connection changing the direction at right angles.

ellachick (el'-a-chik), n. [Nesqually Ind. el-lachick.] A tortoise of the family Clemmydæ, Chelopus marmoratus. It is usually about 7 or 8 inches long, and is the most important economic tortoise of the Pacific coast of the United States; it lives in rivers and ponds, and lays its eggs in June. It is always on sale in the San Francisco market, and is highly esteemed for food, although inferior to the turtle.

ellagic (el-a-j'ik), a. [*< ellag, an arbitrary transposition of F. galle, gall, + -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from gallnuts.—Ellagic acid, C₁₄H₆O₆, an acid which may be prepared from gallic acid, but is procured in largest quantities from the Oriental bezoar. Pure ellagic acid is a light, pale-yellow, tasteless powder, soluble in water, and is used as a cosmetic. With the bases it forms salts. Also called bezardic acid.

ell-bone (el'bōn), n. [< ell (taken in its orig. sense, AS. eln = L. ulna) + bone. Cf. elbow.] The bone of the forearm; the ulna.

ellebore, n. An obsolete variant of hellebore. Chaucer.

elleborin (el'bō-rin), n. [< L. elleborus, helleborus, + -in; see hellebore.] A resin of an extremely acid taste, found in the Helleborus hibernicus, or winter hellebore.

elleck (el'ek), n. [E. dial.; origin unknown. Cf. Elleck, Ellick, Ellek, etc., colloquial abbreviations of Alexander.] A local English name of the red gurnard, Trigla cuculus.

eller¹ (el'ér), n. A dialectal form of *elder*².

eller² (el'ér), n. A dialectal form of *elder*¹.

Ellerian (el-lé'-ri-an), n. A member of a sect of German Millenarians of the eighteenth century, founded by Elias Eller (died 1750). The Ellerians expected the Messiah to be born again of the wife of their leader, whose professed revelations they accepted as of equal authority with the Bible. From Ronsdorf, the place of their settlement, they are also called Ronsdorfians.

ellern, a. A dialectal form of alder.

ellert, adv. A Middle English form of else.

ellipchoanoid (el'i-pō-kō'-a-noid), a. and n. [See Ellipchoanoida.] 1. a. Having incomplete septal funnels; specifically, of or pertaining to the Ellipchoanoida. Also ellipchoanoidal.

II. n. A member of the Ellipchoanoida. Ellipchoanoida (el'i-pō-kō'-a-noi'dā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐλλίπης, omitting, falling short (< ἐλλεπεσθαι, omit, fall short: see ellipse), + χοάνη, a funnel, + -ida.] A group of nautiloid cephalopods whose septal funnels are short, the siphon being completed by means of a more or less porous intervening connective wall: contrasted with Holochanoida. A. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., XXII. 260.

ellipchoanoidal (el'i-pō-kō'-a-noi'dal), a. Same as ellipchoanoid.

ellipse (el-ips'), n. [= D. Sw. ellips = G. Dan. ellipse = F. ellipse = Sp. elipse = Pg. elipse = It. ellisse, ellisse, ellipse, < Gr. ἐλλειψις, a want, defect, an ellipse, < Gr. ἐλλείπειν, a leaving out, ellipsis in grammar, a falling short, the conic section ellipse (see def.), < ἐλλείπειν, leave in, leave behind, omit, intr. fall short, < ἐν, in, + λείπειν, leave. Cf. ellipsis.] In geom., a plane curve such that the sums of the distances of each point in its periphery from two fixed points, the foci, are equal. It is a conic section (see conic) formed by the intersection of a cone by a plane which cuts obliquely the axis and the opposite sides of the cone. The ellipse is a conic which does not extend to infinity, and whose intersections with the line at infinity are imaginary.

Every ellipse has a center, which is a point such that it bisects every chord passing through it. Such chords are called diameters of the ellipse. A pair of conjugate diameters bisect, each of them, all chords parallel to the other. The longest diameter is called the transverse axis, also the latus transversum; it passes through the foci. The shortest diameter is called the conjugate axis. The extremities of the transverse axis are called the vertices. (See conic, eccentricity, angle.) An ellipse may also be regarded as a flattened circle—that is, as a circle all the chords of which parallel to a given chord have been shortened in a fixed ratio by cutting off equal lengths from the two extremities. The two lines from the foci to any point of an ellipse make equal angles with the tangent at that point. To construct an ellipse, assume any line whatever, AB, to be what is called the latus rectum. At its extremity erect the perpendicular AD of any length, called the latus transversum (transverse axis). Connect BD, and complete the rectangle DABK. From any point L, on the line AD, erect the perpendicular LZ, cutting BK in Z and BD in H. Draw a line HG, completing the rectangle ALHG. There are now two points, E and E', on the line LZ, such that the square on LE or LE' is equal to the rectangle ALHG. The locus of all such points, found by taking L at different places on the line AD, forms an ellipse. [The name ellipse in its Greek form was given to the curve, which had been previously called the section of the acute-angled cone, by Apollonius of Perga, called by the Greeks "the great geometer." The participle ἐλλείπειν, "falling short," had long been technically applied to a rectangle one of whose sides coincides with a part of a given line (see Euclid, VI. 27). So παράλλειλον and εὑρεβάλλον (Euclid, VI. 28, 29) were said of a rectangle whose side extends just as far and overlaps respectively the extremity of a given line. Apollonius first defined the conic sections by plane constructions, using the latus rectum and latus transversum (transverse axis), as above. The ellipse was so called by him because, since the point L lies between A and D, the rectangle ALHG "falls short" of the latus rectum AB. In the case of the hyperbola L lies either to the left of A or to the right of D, and the rectangle ALHG "overlaps" the latus rectum. In the case of the parabola there is no latus transversum, but the line EK extends to infinity, and the rectangle equal to the square of the ordinate has the latus rectum for one side.]—Cubical ellipse. See cubical.—Focal ellipse. See focal.—Infinite ellipse. Same as elliptic.—Logarithmic ellipse, the section of an elliptic cylinder by a paraboloid. Booth, 1852.

ellipsis (el-ips'sis), n.; pl. ellipses (-sēz). [= D. Sw. ellips = G. Dan. ellipse = F. ellipse = Sp. elipsis = Pg. elipse = It. ellisse, ellisse, < L. ellipsis, < Gr. ἐλλειψις, omission, ellipsis: see ellipse.] 1. In gram., omission; a figure of syntax by which a part of a sentence or phrase is used for the whole, by the omission of one or more words, leaving the full form to be understood or completed by the reader or hearer: as, "the heroic virtues I admire," for "the heroic virtues which I admire"; "prythee, peace," for "I pray thee, hold thy peace."—2. In printing, a mark or marks, as, — * * *, . . . , denoting the omission or suppression of letters (as in k—g for king) or of words.—3. In geom., an ellipse.

When a right cone is cut quite through by an inclining plane, the figure produced by the section agrees well with the received notion of an ellipsis, in which the diameters are of an unequal length. Boyle, Works, IV. 464.

ellipsograph (el-ips'-ō-grāf), n. [Prop. elliptograph; < Gr. ἐλλειψις ("ἐλλεπειν"), ellipse (see ellipse), + γράφειν, write.] An instrument for describing ellipses; a trammel. Also elliptograph.

ellipsoid (el-ips'oid), n. [< Gr. ἐλλειψις, ellipse, + -oid, form.] In geom., a solid figure all plane sections of which are ellipses or circles.—Axes of an ellipsoid. See axis.—Central ellipsoid, an ellipsoid having its center at the center of mass of a body, its axes coincident with the principal axes and proportional to the radii of gyration about them.—Ellipsoid of expansion. See strain-ellipsoid, below.—Ellipsoid of gyration, an ellipsoid such that the perpendicular from its center to any tangent plane is equal to the radius of gyration of a given body about that axis.—Ellipsoid of inertia. Same as ellipsoid of gyration.—Ellipsoid of revolution, the surface generated by the rotation of an ellipse about one of its axes. When the rotation is about the major axis, the ellipsoid is prolate; when about the minor, the ellipsoid is oblate.—Equipotential ellipsoid, an ellipsoid whose moments of inertia about all axes are the same as those of a given body.—Momentary ellipsoid, or inverse ellipsoid of inertia, a surface of which every radius vector is inversely proportional to the radius of gyration of the body about that radius vector as an axis. This is sometimes called Poincaré's ellipsoid, though invented by Cauchy.—Reciprocal ellipsoid of expansion, the surface of which each radius vector is inversely proportional to the square root of the linear expansion in the same direction.—Strain-ellipsoid, or ellipsoid of expansion, the ellipsoid into which any strain transforms any infinitesimal sphere in a body.

Ellipse. F and F' are the foci. FM + F'M = MN + MN' being any points in the curve.

ellipsoidal (el-ips'-oi'dal), a. Of the form of an ellipsoid.

elliptic, elliptical (el-ips'tik, -ti-kal), a. [= F. elliptique = Sp. elíptico = Pg. elíptico = It. elíptico, elíptico (cf. D. G. elliptisch = Dan. Sw. elliptisk), < ML. ellipticus, < Gr. ἐλλειπτικός, in grammar, elliptical, defective, < ἐλλείπειν ("ἐλλεπειν"), ellipsis, ellipse: see ellipse, ellipsis.] 1. Pertaining to an ellipse; having the form of an ellipse. [Elliptical is the more common form except in technical uses, and is frequent in them.]

In horses, oxen, goats, sheep, the pupil of the eye is elliptical, the transverse axis being horizontal.

Paley, Nat. Theol., xii.

2. Pertaining to or marked by ellipsis; defective; having a part left out.

In all matters they [early writers] affected curt phrases: and it has been observed that even the colloquial style was barbarously elliptical. I. D. Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 352.

His [Thucydides's] mode of reasoning is singularly elliptical; in reality most consecutive, yet in appearance often incoherent. Macaulay, Athenian Orators.

Production and productive are, of course, elliptical expressions, involving the idea of a something produced; but this something, in common apprehension, I conceive to be, not utility, but wealth. J. S. Mill.

3. In entom., elongate-ovate; more than twice as long as broad, parallel-sided in the middle, and rounded at both ends, but in general more broadly so at the base: applied especially to the abdomen, as in many Hymenoptera.—4. In math., having a pair of characteristic elements imaginary: as, an elliptic involution.—Elliptical gearing. See gearing.—Elliptic arc, a part of an ellipse.—Elliptic chuck. Same as oval chuck (which see under chuck).—Elliptic compasses, an instrument for describing an ellipse by continued motion.—Elliptic conoid, an ellipsoid.—Elliptic coordinates. See coordinates.—Elliptic cycloid. See cycloid.—Elliptic function, a doubly periodic function analogous to a trigonometrical function, and the inverse of an elliptic integral.—Elliptic integral, an integral expressing the length of the arc of an ellipse.—Elliptic involution, one which has no real double points.—Elliptic motion, motion on an ellipse so that equal areas are described about one of the foci in equal times.—Elliptic point on a surface, a synclastic point; a point having the indicatrix an ellipse; a point where the principal tangents are imaginary.

—Elliptic polarization, in optics. See polarization.—Elliptic singularity, an ordinary or inessential singularity of a function. See singularity.—Elliptic space. (a) The space enclosed by an ellipse. (b) See space.—Elliptic spindle, a surface generated by the revolution of an ellipse arc about its chord.

elliptically (el-ips'ti-kal-i), adv. 1. According to the form of an ellipse.

Reflection from the surfaces of metals, and of very high refractive substances such as diamond, generally gives at all incidences elliptically polarised light. Tait, Light, § 287.

2. In the manner of or by an ellipsis; with something left out.

ellipticity (el-ips'tis'i-ti), n. [< elliptic + -ity.] The quality of being elliptic; the degree of divergence of an ellipse from the circle; specifically, in reference to the figure of the earth, the difference between the equatorial and polar semi-diameters divided by the equatorial: as, the ellipticity of the earth is $\frac{1}{298}$. It may also without appreciable error be taken as twice the difference divided by the sum of the two axes.

In 1740 Maclaurin . . . gave the equation connecting the ellipticity with the proportion of the centrifugal force at the equator to gravity. Encyc. Brit., VII. 600.

elliptograph (el-ips'-tō-grāf), n. Same as ellipsograph.

ellipsoid (el-ips'toid), a. and n. [< elliptic + -oid.] 1. a. Somewhat like an ellipse.

II. n. Same as ellipsoid.

elliptois (el-ips'tō-is), n. [Irreg. < Gr. ἐλλειπτικός, elliptic: see elliptic.] A curve defined by the equation $ay^m + n = bx^m (a - x^n)$, where m and n are both greater than 1. Also called infinite ellipse.—Cubic elliptois. See cubic.

ellmother (el'muθ'ér), n. A dialectal form of elmdother. Brockett, [Prov. Eng.]

elloopa (el-lō'pā), n. Same as illupi. See Bassia.

Ellopia (el-lō'pi-ā), n. [NL. (Treitschke, 1825), < Gr. ἐλλοπή, ἐλλοπή, a fish: see Elops.] In entom., (a) A genus of geometrid moths, having a slender body, short, slender, obliquely ascending palpi whose third joint is conical and minute, and entire delicate wings, of one color and not bent on the exterior border. There are upward of 12 species, European, Australian, and American. (b) A genus of leaf-beetles (Chrysomelidae), having one species, E. pedestris, of Tasmania.

ellwand, elwand (el'wond), n. [ell + wand.] 1. An old mete-yard or measuring-rod, which in England was 45 inches long, and in Scotland 37 Scotch or 37.0958 English inches, the standard being the Edinburgh ellwand.

A lively, bustling, arch fellow, whose pack and oaken ell-wand, studded duly with brass points, denoted him to be of Autolycus's profession. Scott, Kenilworth, xix.

2. [cap.] In Scotland, the asterism otherwise known as the Girdle or Belt of Orion. Also called Our Lady's Ellwand.

ellyard, n. [ME. elyerd, < elne, ell, + gerd, etc., yard.] A yard an ell long; a measuring-yard; an ellwand.

The hede of an elnyerde the large lenkthe hede, The grayn al of grene stele and of golde hewen. Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 210.

elm (elm), n. [ME. elm, < AS. elm = Teut. almr = Sw. alm = Dan. alm (alm, elm, obs.) = D. olm = OHG. elm (-boun), afterward (simulating L. ulmus) MIHG. ulm (-boun), G. ulmo = L. ulmus, elm.] The common name for species of Ulmus (which see), mostly large trees, some common in cultivation for shade and ornament, for which the majestic height and the wide-spreading and gracefully curving branches of the principal kinds admirably adapt them. The hard, heavy timber of most of the species is valuable for many purposes. Of the European species, the common English elm is U. campestris, of which the cork-elm (U.

Flowering Branch and Foliage of English Elm (Ulmus campestris), with flower and fruit on larger scale.

suberosa), with thick plates of cork on the branches, is probably only a variety. The Scotch elm, or wych-elm, U. montana, is a smaller tree than the English elm. The American species are distinguished as the American elm, white elm, or water-elm, U. americana; the cedar-elm of Texas, U. crassifolia; the cork-, cliff-, hickory-, swamp-, or rock-elm, U. racemosa; the red elm, alpenery-elm, or muscadine-elm, U. fulva, the inner bark of which is rutiliginous, and is used in medicine; and the winged elm, or wahoo, U. alata, with corky-winged branches. In Australia the name is given to the Aphananthe Philippinensis, a species allied to the true elm. In the West Indies Cordia Gerascanthus and C. gerascanthoides, of the order Boraginaceae, receive the name, as also the rubicuneous Hamelia ventricosa. The wood is the toughest of European woods, and is considered to bear the driving of bolts and nails better than any other. It is very durable under water, and is frequently used for keels of ships, for boat-building, and for many structures exposed to wet, or when great strength is required. Because of its toughness, it is used for naves of wheels, shells for tackle-blocks, and common turnery. Wych-elm is much used by coach-makers, and by ship-builders for making jolly-boats. Rock-elm is much used in boat-building, and to some extent for bows.

The elm delights in a sound, sweet, and fertile land, something more inclin'd to moisture, and where good pasture is produced. Eochem, Sylva, v. § 6.

When the broad elm, sole empress of the plain, Whose circling shadow speaks a century's reign, Wreathes in the clouds her regal diadem— A forest waving on a single stem.

O. W. Holmes, Poetry.

elmen (el'men), a. [elm + -en.] Of or pertaining to the elm, or consisting of elm. Also, less properly, elmin. [Rare.]

Leaning against the elmin tree, With drooping head and slackened knee, With clenched teeth, and close-clasped hands, In agony of soul he stands! Scott, Rokeby, li. 27.

elmeset, elmeset, n. Middle English forms of alms.

Elmidae (el'mi-dē), n. pl. [NL. < Elmis + -idae.] A family of clavicorn Coleoptera, taking name from the genus Elmis: now called Farridae (which see).

elmin, a. See elmen.

Elmis (el'mis), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1802).] A genus of clavicorn beetles, of the family Paranida, having only five ventral segments and rounded anterior coxae. E. condimentarius is so named from being said to be used for flavoring food in Peru. The genus is wide-spread, species occurring in Europe, Australia, and North and South America. There are 21 in North America and about twice as many in other countries.

Elmo's fire, St. Elmo's fire (el'mōz fir, sāt el'mōz fir). [After Saint Elmo, bishop of Formia, a town of ancient Italy, who died about 304, and whom sailors in the Mediterranean invoke during a storm.] Same as corposant.

elm-tree (elm'trē), n. See elm.

elm-wood (elm'wūd), n. The wood of the elm-tree.

elmy (el'mi), a. [elm + -y.] Abounding with elms.

If thy farm extends Near Cotswold downs, or the delicious groves Of Symonds, honour'd through the sandy soil Of elmy Ross, . . . Dyer, The Fleece, l. 1.

Thy summer woods Are lovely, O my Mother! Iale! the birch Light bending on thy banks, thy elmy vales, Thy venerable oaks! Southey.

elnet, n. An obsolete form of ell.

It must not be measured by the intemperate elms of it selfe. Lord Brooke, Letter to an Honourable Lady (1633), l.

elocation (ē-lō-kā'shon), n. [ML. elocatio (-n), a hiring out, < L. elocare, let out, hire out, < e, out, + locare, place, let, hire out: see locate. In the second sense taken in the lit. meaning 'put out of place.'] 1. The act of hiring out or apprenticing.

There may be some particular cases incident, wherein perhaps this (consent in marriage) may without sin or blame be forborne: as when the child, either by general permission, or former elocation, shall be out of the parents' disposing. Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience, iv. 1.

2. Departure from the usual state or mood; displacement; an ecstasy.

In all poetry . . . there must be . . . an elocation and emotion of the mind. Fotherby, Atheomastix, p. 30.

elocular (ē-lōk'ū-lār), a. [L. e, out, + loculus, a compartment, a little place, dim. of locus, a place: see loculus, locus.] In bot., not partitioned; having no compartments or loculi.

elocution (el-ō-kū'shon), n. [= F. elocution = Sp. elocucion = Pg. elocução = It. elocuzione, < L. elocutio (-n), a speaking out, utterance, esp. rhetorical utterance, elocation, < eloqui, pp. elocutus, speak out, utter, < e, out, + loqui, speak. Cf. eloquence.] 1. The manner of speaking in public; the art of correct delivery in speaking or reading; the art which teaches the proper use of the voice, gesture, etc., in public speaking.

Elocution, which anciently embraced style and the whole art of rhetoric, now signifies manner of delivery, whether of our own thoughts or those of others. E. Porter.

2t. Eloquence in style or delivery; effective utterance or expression.

As I have endeavoured to adorn it with noble thoughts, so much more to express those thoughts with elocution. Dryden.

Graceful to the senate Godfrey rose, And deep the stream of elocution flows. Brooke, tr. of Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, l.

3. Speech; the power or act of speaking.

Whose taste . . . gave elocution to the mute. Milton, P. L., ix. 748.

Can you deliver a series of questions without a quickening of your elocution? A. Phelps, English Style, p. 268.

= Syn. 1. Elocution, Delivery. These words are quite independent of their derivation. Elocution has narrowed its meaning (see quotation from E. Porter, above), and has broadened it to take in gesture. They are now essentially the same, covering bodily carriage and gesture as well as the use of the voice. Elocution sometimes seems more manifestly a matter of art than delivery. See oratory.

elocutionary (el-ō-kū'shon-ār-i), a. [elocution + -ary.] Of or pertaining to elocation.

elocutor (el-ō-kū'shon-ēr), n. A public speaker or declaimer. [Colloq.]

They [those] heedless young fellows, that think nothing o' the fundamentals o' their faith, but are aye crying out about the elocutors and poetry-mongers they've heard in Glasgow. W. Black, In Far Lochaber.

elocationist (el-ō-kū'shon-ist), n. [elocation + -ist.] A person versed in the art of elocation; one who teaches or writes upon elocation, or who gives public elocationary readings or exercises.

elocutive (el'ō-kū-tiv), a. [elocution + -ive.] Pertaining to elocation.

Preaching in its elocutive part is but the conception of man, and differs as the gifts and abilities of men give it lustre or depression. Feltham, Resolves, li. 48.

elod (el'ōd), n. [el(ectric) + od.] Electric od; the supposed odic force of electricity. Reichenbach.

elodian (ē-lō'di-an), n. One of the marsh-tortoises, a group of chelonians corresponding to the families Chelydidae and Emydidæ.

éloge (ā-lōzh'), n. [F.: see elogy.] A panegyric; a funeral oration; specifically, one of the class of biographical eulogies pronounced upon all members of the French academies after their death, of which many volumes have been published.

I return you, sir, the two eloges, which I have perused with pleasure. I borrow that word from your language, because we have none in our own that exactly expresses it. Bp. Atterbury, To M. Thiriot, Ep. Corr., l. 179.

elogia, n. Plural of elogium.

elogist (el'ō-jist), n. [= F. élogiste = Sp. (obs.) It. elogista; as elogy + -ist.] One who pronounces a panegyric, especially upon the dead; one who delivers an éloge. [Rare.]

[One] made the funeral sermon who had been one of her professed authors; and so she did not want a passionate elogist, as well as an excellent preacher. Sir H. Wotton, Reliquie, p. 360.

elogium (ē-lō'ji-um), n.; pl. elogia (-ā). [L.: see elogy.] Same as elogy.

But if Jesus of Nazareth had raised an army in defence of their liberty, and had destroyed the Romans, . . . then they would willingly have given him that title, which was set up only in derision as the Elogium of his Cross, Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews.

Stillington, Sermons, l. viii.

elogy (el'ō-ji), n.; pl. elogies (-jiz). [= F. élogie = Sp. Pg. It. elogio, < L. elogium, a short maxim or saying, an inscription on a tombstone, a clause in a will, a judicial abstract, appar. a dim. of logus, logos, a word, a saying (< Gr. λόγος, a word: see logos), with prefix e, after λόγος, speak out; cf. eloquium, eloquence, also a declaration.] A funeral oration; an éloge. [Rare, eulogy, a different word, being used in its stead.]

In the centre, or midst of the pegme, there was an aback, or square, wherein this elogy was written. B. Jonson, King James's Coronation Entertainment.

Elohim (el'ō-him), n. pl. [Heb. 'Elohim, pl. of 'Eloah: see Allah.] One of the names of God, of frequent occurrence in the Hebrew text of the Old Testament. Biblical critics are not agreed as to the reason for the use of the plural form: some regard it as a covert suggestion of the Trinity; others as a plural of excellence; others as an indication of an earlier polytheistic belief; still others as an embodiment of the Hebrew faith that the powers represented by the gods of the heathen were all included in one Divine Person.

Elohim (el'ō-hizm), n. [elohim + -ism.] Worship of God as Elohim.

It was the task of the great prophets to eliminate the distinctive religion of Jahveh, . . . and to bring Israel back to the primitive Elohim of the patriarchs. Edinburgh Rev., CXIV. 502.

Elohist (el'ō-hist), n. [elohim + -ist.] A title given to the supposed writer (a unity of authorship being assumed) of the Elohist passages of the Pentateuch, in contradistinction to Jehovist.

The descriptions of the Elohist are regular, orderly, clear, simple, inartificial, calm, free from the rhetorical and poetical. S. Davidson.

It no longer seems worth while to write puerile essays to show that the Elohist was versed in all the conclusions of modern geology. N. A. Rev., CXXVII. 334.

Elohist (el'ō-his'tik), a. [elohist + -ic.] A term applied to certain passages in the Pentateuch, in which God is always spoken of in the Hebrew text as Elohim, supposed by some to have been written at an earlier period than those passages in which he is spoken of as Jehovah. The Elohist paragraphs are simpler, more pastoral, and more primitive in their character than the Jehovistic. Gen. i. 27 is Elohist; Gen. ii. 21-24 is Jehovistic.

The New Testament authors followed the Elohist account, and speak of him [Balaam] disparagingly. Encyc. Brit., III. 259.

eloin, eloignat, etc. See eloin, etc.

eloin, eloign (ē-loin'), v. [Also written eloine, eloigne; < OF. eloigner, esoigner, F. éloigner = Pr. esloignar, esloingnar, < LL. elongare, remove, keep aloof, prolong, etc.: see elong.] I. trans. To separate and remove to a distance.

From worldly cares himselfe he did esloigne.

Spenser, F. Q., l. iv. 20.

Eloigne, sequester, and divorce her, from your bed and your board. Chapman, All Fools, iv. 1.

I'll tell thee now (dear love) what thou shalt do
To anger destiny, as she doth us;
How I shall stay, though she eloin me thus.

Donne, Valediction to his Book.

If the person be conveyed out of the sheriff's jurisdiction, the sheriff may return that he is *eloin*ed.

Blackstone, Com. III. viii.

II.† intrans. To abscond.
eloinater, eloinater (ē-loi'nāt), v. t. [eloin, eloin, + -ate, after elongate, q. v.] To remove; eloin.

Nor is some vulgar Greek so far adulterated, and *eloin*ated from the true Greek, as Italian is from the Latin.
Howell, Foreign Travel, p. 149.

eloinment, eloinment (ē-loin'ment), n. [eloin, eloin, + -ment, after F. éloignement.] Removal to a distance; hence, distance; remoteness.

He discovers an eloinment from vulgar phrases much becoming a person of quality.
Shenstone.

elomet, n. Orpiment.
elong (ē-lōng'), v. t. [LL. elongare, remove, keep aloof, prolong, protract, < e, out, + longus, long; see long. Cf. eloin.] 1. To elongate; lengthen out.

Ne pulle it not, but goodly plaine elonge,
Ne picho it not to sore into the vale,
Nor breke it not all down aboute a dale.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 4.

2. To put far off; retard.

By sea, and hills elonged from thy sight,
Thy wonted grace reduced to my mind,
Instead of sleep thus I occupy the night.
Wyatt, The Lover Prayeth Venus.

Upon the roof the bird of sorrow sat,
Elonging joyful day with her sad note.
G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph, ii. 24.

elongate (ē-lōng'gāt), v.; pret. and pp. elongated, ppr. elongating. [LL. elongatus, pp. of elongare: see long.] 1. trans. 1. To make long or longer; lengthen; extend, stretch, or draw out in length: as, to elongate a rope by splicing.

Here the spire turns round a very elongated axis.

W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 465.

2.† To remove further off.

The first star of Aries in the time of Meton the Athenian was placed in the intersection, which is now elongated and removed eastward twenty-eight degrees.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 13.

II. intrans. To recede; move to a greater distance; particularly, to recede apparently from the sun, as a planet in its orbit. [Rare.] elongate (ē-lōng'gāt), a. [LL. elongatus, pp.: see the verb.] Lengthened; extended or produced; attenuated; specifically, in zool. and bot., disproportionately or comparatively long or extended: as, a worm has an elongate body; a proboscis is an elongate snout; elongate antennæ are about as long as the body of an insect; elongate elytra extend beyond the abdomen; an elongate flower-stem.

elongation (ē-lōng-gā'shon), n. [ME. elongacion, < OF. elongation, F. elongation = Pg. elongação = It. elongazione, < ML. elongatio (n-), < LL. elongare, lengthen, elongate: see elong, elongate.] 1. The act of elongating or lengthening; the state of being elongated or lengthened.

This whole universality of things, which we call the world, is indeed nothing else but a production, and elongation, and dilatation of the natural goodness of Almighty God.

Fotherby, Atheomastix, p. 237.

To this motion of elongation of the fibres is owing the union or conglutination of the parts of the body, when they are separated by a wound.

Arbuthnot, Aliments.

2. Extension; continuation.

His skin (excepting only his face and the palms of his hands) was entirely grown over with an horny excrescence called by the naturalists the elongation of the papillæ.

Cambridge, The Scribleriad, note.

May not the mountains of Westmoreland and Cumberland be considered as elongations of these two chains?

Pinkerton.

3.† Distance; space which separates one thing from another. Glanville.—4.† A removing to a distance; removal; recession.

Our voluntary elongation of ourselves from God's presence must needs be a fearful introduction to an everlasting distance from him.

Ep. Hall, Remains, p. 89.

Concerning the nature or proper effects of this spot or stain (upon the soul), they have not been agreed: some call it an obligation or a guilt of punishment. . . . Some fancy it to be an elongation from God, by dissimilitude of conditions.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 723.

5. In astron.: (a) The angular distance of a planet from the sun, as it appears to the eye of a spectator on the earth; apparent departure of a planet from the sun in its orbit: as, the elongation of Venus or Mercury. (b) The angular distance of a satellite from its primary.

—6. In urg.: (a) A partial dislocation, occasioned by the stretching or lengthening of the ligaments. (b) The extension of a part beyond its natural dimensions.

elongative (ē-lōng'gā-tiv), a. [< elongate + -ive.] Tending to, productive of, or exhibiting elongation; extended. [Rare.]

This elongative effort. Congregationalist, Oct. 22, 1885.

elope (ē-lōp'), v. i.; pret. and pp. eloped, ppr. eloping. [Formerly also ellope; < D. ontloopen (= G. entlaufen = Dan. undløbe), run away, < ont (= G. ont = AS. and; see and)-, away, + loopen, run (> E. lope, q. v.) = AS. hleapan, E. leap, q. v.] To run away; escape; break loose from legal or natural ties; specifically, to run away with a lover or paramour in defiance of duty or social restraints.

But now, when Philtra saw my lands decay
And former lived layle, she left me quight,
And to my brother did elope straight way.

Spenser, F. Q., V. iv. 9.

It is necessary to treat women as members of the body politic, since great numbers of them have eloped from their allegiance.

Addison, Freeholder.

Love and elope, as modern ladies do.

Cawthorn, Nobility.

Southey writes to his daughter Edith in 1824, "All the maids eloped because I had turned a man out of the kitchen at eleven o'clock on the preceding night."

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 265.

elopement (ē-lōp'ment), n. [< elope + -ment.] A running away; an escape; private or unlicensed departure from the place or station to which one is bound by duty or law: specifically applied to the running away of a woman, married or unmarried, with a lover.

The negligent husband, trusting to the efficacy of his principle, was undone by his wife's elopement from him.

Arbuthnot.

Her imprudent elopement from her father.

Graves.

But in case of elopement . . . the law allows her no alimony.

Blackstone, Com., II. xv.

eloper (ē-lō'pēr), n. One who elopes.

Nothing less, believe me, shall ever urge my consent to wound the chaste propriety of your character, by making you an eloper with a duellist.

Miss Burney, Cecilia, ii.

Elopes (el'ō-pēz), n. pl. [NL. pl. of Elops.] A group of malacopterygian fishes: same as the family Elopidæ.

Elophilæ (e-lōf'i-lē), n. pl. [NL. (Hübner, 1816), prop. Elophilæ, < Gr. ἔλος, palus, a marsh, + φίλος, loving.] A group of pyralid moths.

elopian (ē-lō'pi-an), n. A fish of the family Elopidæ.

Sir J. Richardson.

Elopidæ (e-lōp'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elops + -idæ.] A family of eluiform isospondylous fishes, resembling herrings, but much larger. They have a completed lateral line and a flat membrane between the branches of the lower jaw. They have cycloid scales, naked head, and terminal mouth, bounded on the sides by the supramaxillaries, which are composed of three elements. The species are very few, though widely distributed in tropical and subtropical seas, sometimes entering fresh water. They belong to the genera Elops and Megaloops. See cut under Elops.

Elopina (el-ō-pi'nā), n. pl. [NL., < Elops + -ina.] In Günther's classification of fishes, the sixth group of his Clupeide, with the upper jaw shorter than the lower, the abdomen rounded, and an osseous gular plate: same as the family Elopidæ.

elopine (el'ō-pin), a. and n. 1. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Elopina.

II. n. A fish of the group Elopina.

eloptinum, n. An old name for vitriol.

Elops (el'ōps), n. [NL., < L. elops, < Gr. ἔλωψ, prop. ἔλωψ, a sea-fish, also a serpent so called, prop. adj., mute.] The typical genus of the family Elopidæ. E. saurus, known as the ten-pounder and big-eyed herring, is a widely diffused species in both the Atlantic and the Pacific.

Big-eyed Herring (Elops saurus).

eloquence (el'ō-kwens), n. [< ME. eloquence, < OF. eloquence, F. eloquence = Pg. eloquencia, eloquens = Sp. elocuencia = Pg. eloquencia = It. eloquenzia (obs.), eloquenzia, < L. eloquentia, < eloquen (t-s), eloquent: see eloquent.] 1. The quality of being eloquent; moving utterance or expression; the faculty, art, or act of uttering or employing thoughts and words springing from or expressing strong emotion in a manner to excite corresponding emotion in others; by extension, the power or quality of exciting emotion, sympathy, or interest in any way: as, pulpit eloquence; a speaker, speech, or writing of great eloquence; the eloquence of tears or of silent grief.

Ther is non that is here,

Of eloquence that shal be thy pere.

Chaucer, Prolog to Franklin's Tale, l. 6.

True eloquence [in source or origin] I find to be none but the serious and hearty love of truth.

Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

By eloquence we understand the overflow of powerful feelings upon occasions fitted to excite them.

De Quincey, Rhetoric.

What is called eloquence in the forum is commonly found to be rhetoric in the study.

Thoreau, Walden, p. 111.

[Hugh] Peters would seem to have been one of those men gifted with what is sometimes called eloquence; that is, the faculty of stating things powerfully from momentary feeling, and not from that conviction of the higher reason which alone can give force and permanence to words.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 248.

2. That which is expressed in an eloquent manner: as, a flow of eloquence.

Then I'll commend her volubility,

And say she uttereth piercing eloquence.

Shak., T. of the S., ii. 1.

= Syn. 1. Elocution, Rhetoric, etc. See oratory. eloquent (el'ō-kwent), a. [= F. eloquent = Pr. eloquen = Sp. elocuente = Pg. It. eloquente, < L. eloquent (t-s), speaking, having the faculty of speech, eloquent, ppr. of eloqui, speak out, < e, out, + loqui, speak.] 1. Having the power of expressing strong emotions in vivid and appropriate speech; able to utter moving thoughts or words: as, an eloquent orator or preacher; an eloquent tongue.

And for to loken ouermore,

Next of science the seconde

Is Rhetoric, whose faconde

Aboute all other is eloquent.

Gower, Conf. Amant., vii.

Lucullus was very eloquent, well spoken, and excellently well learned in the Greek and Latin tongues.

North, tr. of Plutarch, p. 421.

She was the most eloquent of her age, and cunning in all languages.

B. Jonson, Masque of Queens.

Till the sad breaking of that Parliament

Broke him, as that dishonest victory

At Charonea, fatal to liberty,

Kill'd with report that old man eloquent.

Milton, Sonnets, v.

2. Expressing strong emotions with fluency and power; movingly uttered or expressed; stirring; persuasive: as, an eloquent address; eloquent history; an eloquent appeal to a jury.

Doubtless that indeed according to art is most eloquent which returns and approaches nearest to nature from whence it came.

Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

Burke, though he had long and deeply disliked Chatham, combined with Fox in paying an eloquent tribute to his memory.

Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xiv.

3. Manifesting or exciting emotion, feeling, or interest through any of the senses; movingly expressive or affecting: as, eloquent looks or gestures; a hush of eloquent silence.

Give it breath with your mouth, and it will discourse most eloquent music.

Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2 (Globe ed.).

4. Giving strong expression or manifestation; vividly characteristic.

His whole attitude eloquent of discouragement.

Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 131.

eloquently (el'ō-kwent-li), adv. With eloquence; in an eloquent manner; in a manner to please, affect, or persuade.

Some who (their hearers swaying where they would)
Could force affections, comfort and deject,
With learned lectures eloquently told.

Stirling, Domes-day, The Tenth Hour.

eloquist, a. [< L. eloquium, eloquence, < eloqui, speak out: see eloquent.] Eloquent.

Eloquist hoar's beard, father Nestor, you were one of them; And you, M. Ulisses, the prudent dwarf of Pallas, another; of whom it is illiadized that your very nose dropt sugarcandie.

or parry a blow, frustrate, deceive, mock, < e, out, + ludere, play: see ludicrous. Cf. allude, collude, delude, ilude.] 1. To avoid by artifice, stratagem, deceit, or dexterity; escape; evade:
as, to elude pursuit; to elude a blow or stroke.

The stroke of humane law may also . . . be evaded by power, or eluded by slight, by gift, by favour.

Barrow, Works, II. xxxiii.

Tho' stuck with Argus' Eyes your Keeper were,
Advis'd by me, you shall elude his Care.

Congreve, Tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

Me gentle Delia beckons from the plain,
Then, hid in shades, eludes her eager swain.

Pope, Spring, I. 54.

By making concessions apparently candid and ample,
they elude the great accusation.
Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

2. To remain unseen, undiscovered, or unexplained by; baffle the inquiry or scrutiny of: as, secrets that elude the keenest search.

On this subject Providence has thought fit to elude our curiosity. Goldsmith, Vicar, xxix.

One element must forever elude its researches; and that is the very element by which poetry is poetry.

Macaulay, Dryden.

His mind was quick, versatile, and imaginative; few aspects of a subject eluded it. Edinburgh Rev.

The secret and the mystery
Have baffled and eluded me.

Longfellow, Golden Legend, i., Prol.

=Syn. To shun, flee, shirk, dodge, baffle, foil, frustrate.
eludible (ē-lū'di-bl), a. [< elude + -ible.] Capable of being eluded or escaped.

In this blessed part of our law be eludible at pleasure,
. . . we shall have little reason to boast of our advantage in this particular over other states or kingdoms in Europe.
Swift, Drapier's Letters, vii.

hip-shot, having the hip dislocated (< e, out, + lumbus, loin: see lumber, loin), + -ate + -ed.]
Weakened in the loins. Bailey.

eluscation (ē-lus-kā'shon), n. [< LL. as if eluscatio* (n-), < eluscare, make one-eyed, < L. e, out, + luscus, one-eyed.] Blear-eye or pur-blindness. Bailey, 1727.

elusion (ē-lū'zhon), n. [< ML. elusio (n-), < L. eludere, pp. elusus, elude: see elude.] Escape by artifice or deceit; evasion; deception; fraud.

Any sophist shall think his elusion enough to contest against the authority of a council.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 348.

An appendix relating to the transmutation of metals detects the impostures and elusions of those who have pretended to it.

Woodward, Essay towards a Nat. Hist. of the Earth.

elusive (ē-lū'siv), a. [< L. elusus, pp. of eludere, elude, + -ive.] Eluding, or having a tendency to elude; hard to grasp or confine; slippery.

Hurl'd on the crags, behold they gasp, they bleed!
And, groaning, cling upon th^e elusive weed!

Falconer, Shipwreck, iii.

Piety is too subtle and elusive to be drawn into and confined in definitions. Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 102.

The moon was full, and snowed down the mellowed light on the gray domes, which in their soft, elusive outlines, and strange effect of far-withdrawal, rhymed like faint-heard refrains to the bright and vivid arches of the façade.
Hovells, Venetian Life, xviii.

elusively (ē-lū'siv-li), adv. With or by elusion.
elusiveness (ē-lū'siv-nes), n. The quality of being elusive; tendency to elude.

Moreover, we had Miss Peggy, with her banjo and her ceptive, < L. elusus, pp. of eludere, elude: see elude.] Of an elusive character; slipping from the grasp; misleading; fallacious; deceitful.

Without this the work of God had perished, and religion itself had been elusory.

Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, III. vi. § 1.

elute (ē-lūt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. eluted, ppr.
eluting. [< L. elutus, pp. of elucere, wash off, <
e, out, off, + luere, wash: see lute, lotion. Cf.
dilute.] To wash off; cleanse. [Rare.]

The more oily any spirit is the more pernicious, because it is harder to be eluted by the blood.

Arbuthnot, Aliments, v.

elution (ē-lū'shon), n. [< LL. elutio (n-), a washing, < L. elucere, wash off.] A washing out; any process by which bodies are separated by the action of a solvent; specifically, a process of recovering sugar from molasses, which consists in precipitating the sugar as saccharate of lime, insoluble in cold water, and washing it free from soluble impurities. The saccharate is decomposed by carbonic acid, which precipitates the lime as carbonate, and the pure sugar-solution is then evaporated to crystallization.

elutriate (ē-lū'tri-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. elutriated, ppr. elutriating. [< L. elutriatus, pp.
of elutriare, wash out, decant, rack off, < eluere, wash out: see elute.] To purify by washing and straining or decanting; purify in general.

Elutriating the blood as it passes through the lungs.

Arbuthnot, Air.

elutiation (ē-lū'tri-ā'shon), n. [= F. elutria-tion = Pg. elutriação, < L. as if elutratio* (n-), < eluxation (ē-luk-sā'shon), n. [eluxate + -ion.] The dislocation of a bone; luxation. Dunglison. [Rare.]

elvan¹ (el'vān), a. An improper form of elfin. elvan² (el'vān), n. [Of Corn. origin.] The name given in Cornwall (England) to dikes, which are of frequent occurrence in that region, and which, throughout the principal mining districts, have a course approximately parallel with the majority of the most productive tin and copper lodes. The elvans—or elvan-courses, as they are frequently called—have almost identically the same ultimate chemical and mineralogical composition as the granites of Cornwall, but differ considerably from them in the mode of aggregation of their constituents. They vary in width from a few feet to several fathoms; they traverse alike granites and slates, but are more numerous in the vicinity of the granites than they are elsewhere. Many elvans have been worked for the tin ore which they sometimes contain. The rock of which elvans are made up when occurring in loose fragments is also called elvan or elvan-rock.

elvanite (el'vān-it), n. [*elvan*² + -ite.] The name given by some lithologists to the variety of rock of which the Cornish elvans are made up: nearly equivalent to quartz-porphry and granitic porphyry.

Elvellaceæ, Elvellacei (el-ve-lā'sē-ē, -ī), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Helvellaceæ, Helvellacei.

elven (el'ven), n. [A dial. corruption of elmen.] An elm. [Prov. Eng.]

elver (el'ver), n. [A dial. corruption of eelfare, q. v.] A young eel; especially, a young conger or sea-eel. [Local, Eng.]

elver-cake¹ (el'ver-kāk), n. Eel-cake.

These elver-cakes they dispose of at Bath and Bristol; and when they are fried and eaten with butter, nothing can be more delicious.

Defoe, Tour through Great Britain, II. 306.

elves, n. Plural of elf.

elvine, n. [E. dial.; cf. elver.] The young of the eel. [Local, Eng.]

elvish, elvishly. See elfish, elfishly.

elwand, n. See elwand.

Elymnias (e-lim'ni-as), n. [NL. (Hübner, 1816), irreg. < Gr. ἔλμνος, a case; cf. elytrum.] A genus of butterflies, giving name to the subfamily Elymniinae. E. lais is the type-species, and there are three others, all of the old world.

Elymniinae (e-lim-ni'ni-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Elymnias + -inae.] A subfamily of old-world nymphalid butterflies, of one genus (Elymnias) and several species, having no ocelli, the wings greatly produced at the apex and their under surface peculiarly marked. Many of them resemble the Danaïnae in general aspect.

Elymus (el'i-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἔλυμος, a kind of grain, panic or millet.] A genus of coarse perennial grasses, of northern temperate regions, allied to Hordeum. There are about a dozen species in the United States, some of which serve for hay and pasturage. Commonly known as rye-grass or lyme-grass.

Elysia (ē-lis'i-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑλυσίος, Elysian: see Elysium.] The typical genus of abranthiate gastropods of the family Elysiidae, having well-developed tentacles and the sides of the body with wing-like expansions. E. viridis, of European, and E. chlorotica, of American seas, are examples; they resemble slugs, and are found in sea-wrack, eel-grass, etc.

Elysian (ē-liz'i-an), a. [= F. élysien, a., élysien, n.; cf. Sp. eliseo, elísio = Pg. elysio = It. elísio, < L. elysius, < Gr. ἑλυσίος, Elysian: see Elysium.] Pertaining to Elysium, or the abode of the blessed after death; hence, blessed; delightfully, exquisitely, or divinely happy; full of the highest kind of enjoyment, happiness, or bliss.

The power I serve Laughs at your happy Araby, or the Elysian shades. Massinger, Virgin Martyr, iv. 3.

In that Elysian age (misnamed of gold),
The age of love, and innocence, and joy,
When all were great and free! Beattie, Minstrel, ii.

Hope's Elysian isles. O. W. Holmes, Fountain of Youth.

There is no Death! What seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but the suburb of the life Elysian, Whose portal we call Death.

Longfellow, Resignation.

Elysian Fields [cf. F. Champs-Élysées = Sp. Campos Eliseos = Pg. Campos Eliseos or simply Eliseos = It. Campi Elisi, < L. Campi Elisi or simply Elisi, tr. of Gr. ἑλυσία πεδία: see Elysium], Elysium.

elysiid (ē-lis'i-id), n. A gastropod of the family Elysiidae.

Elysiidae (el-i-si'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Elysia + -idae.] A family of marine saccoglossate pellibranchiate gastropods, with auriform tentacles, without gills, and resembling slugs, but having the sides of the body alate. The whole shape is leaf-like, the neck corresponding to a petiole. Also spelled Elysiadæ. See cut under Elysia.

Elysium (ē-liz'ium), n. [= F. Élysée = Sp. Eliseo, Elísio = Pg. Élysée, Elysio = It. Elísio, < L. Elysium (ML. also Elyseum*), < Gr. ἑλυσίων (neut. of ἑλυσίος, Elysian), in ἑλυσίων πεδίων, later in pl. ἑλυσία πεδία, the Elysian Field, or Fields, i. e., the field of the departed, lit. of going or coming, < ἔλυσσις, var. of ἔλυσσις, a going or coming, advent, < ἔλυσσάσθαι, future, ἔλδεν (ind. ἔλδον, ἔλδον), 2d aor., go, come (associated with ἔρχεσθαι, go, come), whence also prob. ἔλδω, free.] In Gr. myth., the abode of the blessed after death. Also called the Elysian Fields. It is placed by Homer on the western border of the earth; by Hesiod and Pindar in the Islands of the Blest; by later poets in the nether world. It was conceived of as a place of perfect delight. In modern literature Elysium is often used for any place of exquisite happiness, and as synonymous (without religious reference) to Heaven.

Once more, farewell! go, find Elysium,
There where the happy souls are crown'd with blessings.
Fletcher, Valentinian, iii. 1.

The flowery-kirtled Naiades . . .
Who, as they sung, would take the prison'd soul,
And lap it in Elysium. Milton, Comus, l. 257.

And, oh! if there be an Elysium on earth,
It is this, it is this. Moore, Light of the Harem.

An Elysium more pure and bright than that of the Greeks. Is. Taylor.

elytra, n. Plural of elytrum.

elytral (el'i-tral), a. [elytrum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the elytra: as, elytral striæ; elytral sulci.—Elytral ligula, a tongue-like process on the inner face of the side margins of the elytrum, serving to hold it more securely to the abdomen in repose, found in certain aquatic beetles.—Elytral plica or fold, a longitudinal ridge on the interior surface of each elytrum, near the outer margin. In repose it embraces the upper surface of the abdomen.

elytriform (el-i-tr'i-fōrm), a. [NL. elytrum, elytrum, + L. forma, shape.] Having the form or character of an elytrum; elytroid.

elytrigerous (el-i-tr'i-gē-rus), a. [NL. elytrum, elytrum, + L. gerere, carry, + -ous.] Having elytra, or bearing an elytrum.

The order of arrangement of the elytrigerous and cirrigerous somites [of Polynoe] is very curious. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 206.

elytrine (el'i-trin), n. [elytrum + -ine.] The substance of which the horny covering of coleopterous insects is composed.

elytritis (el-i-tri'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑλτρον, a sheath (vagina), + -itis.] Colpitis; vaginitis.

elytrocele (el'i-trō-sēl), n. [Gr. ἑλτρον, a sheath (vagina), + κῆλη, a tumor.] Same as colpocele.

elytro-episorrhaphy (el'i-trō-ep'i-si-or'a-fī), n. [Gr. ἑλτρον, a sheath (vagina), + episorrhaphy.] A combination of colpo-episorrhaphy with episorrhaphy.

elytron, n. See elytrum.

elytropiclastic (el'i-trō-plas'tik), a. [As elytropic + -ic.] Same as colpoclastic.

elytropic (el'i-trō-plas'tik), a. [Gr. ἑλτρον, a sheath (vagina), + πλάσσειν, form.] Same as colpoclastic.

Elytrophera (el-i-trop'te-rā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἑλτρον, a case, sheath, elytrum, + πτερόν, a wing.] Clairville's name (1806) of the group of insects now known as the order Coleoptera. It was never current, as the nearly contemporaneous arrangement of Illiger, which combined the Linnean and Fabrician systems, and adopted Ray's name Coleoptera, came at once into general use.

elytropic (el'i-trō-plas'tik), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑλτρον, a sheath (vagina), + πτῶσις, a fall, < πίπτειν, fall.] In pathol., prolapse of the vagina.

elytrorrhaphy (el-i-tror'a-fī), n. [Gr. ἑλτρον, a sheath (vagina), + ῥάφω, a seam, suture, < ῥάπτειν, sew.] Same as colporrhaphy.

elytrotomy (el-i-trot'ō-mi), n. [Gr. ἑλτρον, a sheath (vagina), + τομή, a cutting.] A cutting into the vaginal walls.

elytrum, elytron (el'i-trum, -tron), n.; pl. elytra (-trā). [NL., < Gr. ἑλτρον, a cover, covering, as a case, sheath, shard of a beetle's wing, shell, husk, capsule, etc. (cf. ἔλυμος, a case, cover), < ἔλδεν, roll round, wrap up, cover.]

1. In entom., the modified fore wing of beetles or Coleoptera, forming with its fellow of the opposite side a hard, horny, or leathery case or sheath, more or less completely covering and protecting the posterior membranous wings when these are folded at rest, and usually forming an extensive portion of the upper surface of a beetle; a shard. The elytra are also known as wing-covers or wing-sheaths. They are elevated during flight, but do not serve as wings. See cuts under Coleoptera and beetle.

2. In some chætopodous annelids, as the Aphroditidae, or polychætopodous annelids, as the Polynoe, one of the squamous lamellæ overlying one another on the dorsal surface of the worm, made by a modification of the dorsal cirri of the parapodia, of which they are thus specialized, bispinose appendages.—Auriculate, bispinose, connate, dimidiata, etc., elytra. See the adjectives.

Elzevir (el'ze-vēr), a. and n. [F. Elzévir, formerly also Elsevier, D. Elsevier.] 1. a. 1. Of or belonging to the Elzevir family of Dutch printers. See below.—2. Noting a cut of printing-type. See II., 2.

—Elzevir editions, editions of the Latin, French, and German classics, and other works, published by a family of Dutch printers named Elzevir (Elsevier) at Leyden and Amsterdam, chiefly between 1583 and 1680. These editions are highly prized for their accuracy and the elegance of their type, printing, and general make-up. Those most esteemed are of small size, 24mo, 16mo, and 12mo.

II. n. 1. A book printed by one of the Elzevir family.—2. A form of old-style printing-type, with firm hair-lines and stubby serifs, largely used by the Elzevirs of the seventeenth century.

Elzevirian, Elzevirian (el-ze-vē'ri-an, -ri-an), n. [Elzevir + -an, -ian.] A collector or fancier of Elzevir books. See extract under grangerite.

An "Early-English dramatist," or an Elzevirian. New Princeton Rev., v. 275.

em¹ (em), n. [ME. em*, < AS. em, < L. em, the name of the letter M, < e, the usual assistant vowel, + m; a Latin formation, the Gr. name being μν.] 1. The name of the thirteenth letter of the alphabet, usually written simply m or M.—2. In printing, the square of any size of type.

The large square here shown ■ is the em of the size pica; the small one ■, one fourth the size (one tenth the breadth), the em of the size nonpareil, the one here used. The em is the unit of measurement in calculating the amount of type in a piece of work, as a page, a column, or a book, the standard of reckoning being 1,000; thus, this page or this book contains so many thousand, or so many thousand and hundred, ems. In the United States it is also the unit in calculating the amount of work done by a compositor, while the em is generally used for that purpose in Great Britain.

em², em (always unaccented, um), pron. [Usually written and printed 'em, in 17th century often 'hem, being regarded as a "contraction" or abbreviation of them; but in fact the reg. descendant of ME. hem, him, heom, hom, ham, < AS. him, heom, dat. pl. of hē, he, hēo, she, hit, it, the ME. and AS. dat. becoming the E. obj. (acc. and dat.), as in him and her, and the initial aspirate falling away as in it, and (in easy speech) in he, his, him, her: see he, she, it. But though this is the origin of em or 'em, the form could have arisen independently as a reduction of them, like 'at, 'ere, reduced forms in dial. speech of that, there.] In colloquial speech, the objective plural of he, she, it: equivalent to them.

For he could coin and counterfeit
New words with little or no wit; . . .
And when with hasty noise he spoke 'em,
The ignorant for current took 'em.
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. i. 100.

em-1. Assimilated form of em-1 before labials.

em-2. Assimilated form of em-2 before labials.

emacerate (ē-mas'e-rāt), v. t. or i. [L. emacere, defined 'emaciated,' equiv. to emaciat (see emaciate), if genuine, a mistaken form for emacrat*, < e + macer (macer), lean, whence ult. E. meager, q. v.] To make or become lean; emaciate.

Elytrum of Polynoe, a polychætopodous annelid, bearing fine, veined, and from above (highly magnified).

emaceration† (ē-mas-ē-rā'shōn), n. [< emaciate + -ion.] A making or becoming lean; emaciation.

emaciate (ē-mā'shi-āt), v.; pret. and pp. emaciated, ppr. emaciating. [< L. emaciatus, pp. of emaciare (> It. emaciare), make lean, cause to waste away, < e, out, + maciare, make lean, < macies, leanness, < macere, be lean, macere (< macr-), lean, whence ult. E. meager, q. v.] I. trans. To cause to lose flesh gradually; waste the flesh of; reduce to leanness: as, great suffering emaciates the body.

A cold sweat bedews his emaciated cheeks.

V. Knox, Christian Philosophy, § 56.

II. intrans. To lose flesh gradually; become lean, as by disease or pining; waste away, as flesh.

He [Aristotle] emaciated and pined away.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vii. 14.

emaciate (ē-mā'shi-āt), a. [< L. emaciatus, pp.: see the verb.] Thin; wasted; greatly reduced in flesh. [Poetical.]

Or groom invade me with defying front

And stern demeanour, whose emaciate steeds . . .

Had panted oft beneath my goring steel.

T. Warton, Panegyric on Oxford Ale.

emaciation (ē-mā'shi-ā'shōn), n. [= F. emaciation = Sp. emaciación = Pg. emacição = It. emaciazione; < L. as if emaciatio(n)-*, < emaciare, pp. emaciatus, make lean: see emaciate.] 1. The act of making lean or thin in flesh.—2. The state of becoming thin by gradual wasting of flesh; the state of being reduced to leanness.

Searchers cannot tell whether this emaciation or leanness were from a phthisis, or from an hectic fever.

Gravut, Bills of Mortality.

Marked by the emaciation of abstinence.

Scott.

emaculate† (ē-mak'ū-lāt), v. t. [< L. emaculatus, pp. of emaculare, clear from spots, < e, out, + macula, a spot: see macula and mail.] To free from spots or blemishes; remove errors from; correct.

Lipsius, Savile, Pichena, and others have taken great pains with him [Tacitus] in emaculating the text, settling the reading, etc.

Hales, Golden Remains, p. 273.

emaculation† (ē-mak'ū-lā'shōn), n. [< emaculate + -ion.] The act or operation of freeing from spots.

email, emalt, n. Same as amel.

Set rich rubye to read emalt.

The raven's plume to peacock's emalt.

Puttenham, Partheniades, xv.

emanant (em'a-nant), a. and n. [< L. emanans (< It. emanare, flow out, spring out of, arise, proceed from: see emanate).] I. a. Flowing, issuing, or proceeding from something else; becoming apparent by an effect.

The most wise counsel and purpose of Almighty God terminated in those two great transient or emanant acts or works, the works of creation and providence.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 35.

II. n. In math., the result of operating any number of times upon a quantity with the operator ($x'd/dx + y'd/dy + \text{etc.}$). J. J. Sylvester, 1853. Cayley (1856) defines it as one of the coefficients of the quantity formed by substituting for $x, y, \text{etc.}$, the facients of the quantity to which the emanant belongs, $ix + my$, $ly + my$, etc., and then considering l and m as the two facients of the new quantity so obtained.

emanate (em'a-nāt), v.; pret. and pp. emanated, ppr. emanating. [< L. emanatus, pp. of emanare (> It. emanare = Sp. Pg. emanar = F. émaner, > E. emanē, q. v.), flow out, spring out of, arise, proceed from, < e, out, + mānare, flow: see manation, madid.] I. intrans. To flow out or issue; proceed, as from a source or origin; come or go forth: used chiefly of intangible things: as, light emanates from the sun; fragrance emanates from flowers; power emanates from the people.

That subsisting form of government from which all laws emanate.

De Quincy.

All the stories we heard emanated from Calcutta.

W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I. 2.

The Hebrew word used here [in Genesis] for light includes the allied forces of heat and electricity, which with light now emanate from the solar photosphere.

Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 92.

II. trans. To send or give out; manifest. [Rare.]

We spoke of bright topics only, his manner all the while emanating the silent sympathy which helps so much because it respects so much.

Quoted in Merriam's Bowles, II. 413.

emanate (em'a-nāt), a. [< L. emanatus, pp.: see the verb.] Issuing out; emanant. [Rare.]

emanazione; < L. emanatio(n)-, an emanation, < L. emanare, flow out: see emanate.]

1. The act of flowing or issuing from a fountainhead or origin; emission; radiation.—2. In philos.: (a) Efficient causation due to the essence and not to any particular action of the cause. Thus, when the trunk of a tree is moved, the branches go along with it by virtue of emanation. Hence—(b) The production of anything by such a process of causation, as from the divine essence. The doctrine of emanation appears in its noblest form in the Enneads of Plotinus, who makes sensible things to emanate from the Ideas, the Ideas to emanate from the Nous, and the Nous to emanate from the One. Iamblichus makes the One to emanate from the Good, thus going one step further. The Gnostics and Cabalists pushed the doctrine to fantastic developments.

In the work of the creation we see a double emanation of virtue from God. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 61.

3. That which issues, flows, or is given out from any substance or body; efflux; effluvia: as, the odor of a flower is an emanation of its particles.

Justice is the brightest emanation from the gospel.

Sydney Smith.

4. In alg., the process of obtaining the successive emanants of a quantity.

Regnault's chemical principle of substitution and the algebraical one of emanation are identical. J. J. Sylvester.

Facients of emanation, the facients x', y' , etc., referred to in Cayley's definition of an emanant.

emanationism (em'a-nā'shōn-izm), n. [< emanation + -ism.] Devotion to theories of emanation.

It [superstition] settled very thickly again in the first Christian centuries, as cabalism, emanationism, neo-platonism, etc., with their hierarchies of spirit-holds.

G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 315.

emanatist (em'a-nā-tist), n. and a. [< emanate + -ist.] I. n. In theol., one who believes in the efflux of other beings from the divine essence; especially, a member of one of the ancient Gnostic sects, such as that of the Valentinians, which maintained that other beings were so evolved. See emanation, 2 (b).

II. a. In theol., of or pertaining to the doctrine of the emanatists.

When then it was taken into the service of these Emanatist (Valentinian and Manichean) doctrines, the Homoeism implied nothing higher than a generic or specific bond of unity. . . . The Nicene Fathers, on the other hand, were able, under altered circumstances, to vindicate for the word [Homoeism] its Catholic meaning, unaffected by any Emanatist gloss.

Liddon, Bampton Lectures, pp. 439, 440.

emanative (em'a-nā-tiv), a. [< emanate + -ive.] Proceeding by emanation; issuing or flowing out, as an effect due to the mere existence of a cause, without any particular activity of the latter.

By an emanative cause is understood such a cause as merely by being, no other activity or causality interposed, produces an effect. Dr. H. More, Immortal of Soul, i. 6.

It sometimes happens that a cause causes the effect by its own existence, without any causality distinct from its existence; and this by some is called emanative: which word, though feigned with repugnancy to the analogy of the Latin tongue, yet is it to be used upon this occasion till a more convenient can be found out.

Burgettsdick, tr. by a Gentleman.

'Tis against the nature of emanative effects . . . to substitute but by the continual influence of their causes.

Glanville, Essays, i.

emanatively (em'a-nā-tiv-ly), adv. In or after the manner of an emanation; by emanation.

It is acknowledged by us that no natural, imperfect, created being can create, or emanatively produce, a new substance which was not before, and give it its whole being.

Cudworth, Intellectual System.

emanatory (em'a-nā-tō-ri), a. [*< ML. emanatorius (neut. emanatorium, a fountain), < L. emanare, flow out: see emanate.] Having the nature of an emanation; emanative.

Nor is there any incongruity that one substance should cause something else which we may in some sense call substance, though but secondary or emanatory.

Dr. H. More, Immortal of Soul, i. 6.

émanche (ā-mōsh'), n. In her., same as manche.

emancipate (ē-man'si-pāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. emancipated, ppr. emancipating.

[< L. emancipare, pp. of emancipare, emancipare (> It. emancipare = Sp. Pg. emancipar = F. émanciper = D. emanciperen = G. emancipiren = Dan. emancipere = Sw. emancipera, emancipate), declare (a son) free and independent of the father's power by the three-repeated act of mancipatio and manumissio, give from one's own power or authority into that of another, give up, surrender, < e, out, + mancipare, mancipare, give over or deliver up, as property, by means of the formal act called mancipium, give up, transfer, < maniceps (mancip-), a purchaser, a contractor, lit. one who takes (the property or a symbol of it) in hand, < manus, hand, + capere, take. From maniceps comes also mancipium, the formal act of purchase, hence a thing so purchased, and esp. a slave; but emancipare was not used in reference to freeing slaves, the word for this act being manumittere: see manumit.] 1. To set free from servitude or bondage by voluntary act; restore from slavery to freedom; liberate: as, to emancipate a slave.

When the dying slaveholder asked for the last sacraments, his spiritual attendants regularly adjured him, as he loved his soul, to emancipate his brethren for whom Christ had died.

Macaulay.

2. To set free or liberate; in a general sense, to free from civil restriction, or restraint of any kind; liberate from bondage, subjection, or controlling power or influence: as, to emancipate one from prejudices or error.

They emancipated themselves from dependence.

Arbuthnot.

No man can quite emancipate himself from his age and country.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 319.

= Syn. Emancipate, Manumit, Enfranchise, Liberate, disenfranchise, release, unfetter, unshackle. To manumit is the act of an individual formally freeing a slave; the word has no figurative uses. To emancipate is to free from a literal or a figurative slavery: as, the slaves in the West Indies were emancipated; to emancipate the mind. To enfranchise is to bring into freedom or into civil rights; hence the word often refers to the lifting of a slave into full civil equality with freemen. Liberate is a general word for setting or making free, whether from slavery, from confinement, or from real or figurative oppressions, as fears, doubts, etc.

Thought emancipated itself from expression without becoming its tyrant.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 326.

All slaves that had been taken from the northern shore of the Gulf of Mexico were to be manumitted and restored to their country.

Bancroft, Hist. U. S., I. 52.

In the course of his life he [a Roman master] enfranchised individual slaves. On his death-bed or by his will he constantly emancipated multitudes.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 249.

To cast the captive's chains aside

And liberate the slave.

Longfellow, The Good Part.

emancipate (ē-man'si-pāt), a. [< L. emancipatus, pp.: see the verb.] Freed; emancipated.

We have no slaves at home. Then why abroad?

And they themselves, once ferried o'er the wave

That parts us, are emancipated and loosed.

Cowper, Task, ii. 39.

emancipation (ē-man-si-pā'shōn), n. [= F. émancipation = Sp. emancipación = Pg. emancipação = It. emancipazione = D. emancipatie = G. Dan. Sw. emancipation, < L. emancipatio(n)-, emancipation, < emancipare, emancipate: see emancipate.] 1. The act of setting free from bondage, servitude, or slavery, or from dependence, civil restraints or disabilities, etc.; deliverance from controlling influence or subjection; liberation: as, the emancipation of slaves; emancipation from prejudices, or from burdensome legal disqualifications; the emancipation of Catholics by the act of Parliament passed in 1829.

Previous to the triumph of Emancipation in the Federal District there was no public provision for the education of the Blacks, whether poor or free.

H. Greeley, Amer. Conflict, II. 54.

Emancipation by testament acquired such dimensions that Augustus found it necessary to restrict the power; and he made several limitations, of which the most important was that no one should emancipate by his will more than one hundred of his slaves.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 249.

2. The freeing of a minor from parental control. It may be accomplished by the contract of parent and child, and in the case of a female by marriage, and in some states by judicial decree.—Catholic Emancipation Act. See Catholic.—Emancipation proclamation, in U. S. hist., the proclamation by which, on January 1st, 1863, President Lincoln, as commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, declared as a military measure, in accordance with notice proclaimed September 22d, 1862, that within certain specified territory in armed rebellion all persons held as slaves "are and henceforward shall be free."

Was the Emancipation Proclamation legally operative and efficient the moment it was uttered? or, as many have maintained, only so fast and so far as our armies reached the slaves or the slaves our armies? The Nation, I. 163.

Gradual emancipation, the freeing of slaves by degrees or according to certain individual contingencies, as between specified ages or after a prescribed length of service. Slavery was extinguished by gradual emancipation in most of the original northern United States, and it was at an early date advocated by many in the more southern States. Laws were passed at different periods for gradual emancipation in the British and Spanish West Indies and in Brazil; but they have been in each instance finally superseded by acts for the absolute abolition of slavery. = Syn. 1. Release, manumission, enfranchisement.

emancipationist (ē-man-si-pā'shōn-ist), n. [< emancipation + -ist.] One who is in favor of or advocates the emancipation of slaves.—

Gradual emancipationist, in the history of slavery, one who favored gradual emancipation (which see, under emancipation).

emancipator (ē-man'si-pā-tōr), n. [< LL. emancipator, < L. emancipare, emancipate: see emancipate.] One who emancipates, or liberates from bondage or restraint.

Richard seized Cyprus not as a pirate, but as an avenger and emancipator.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 161.

emancipatory (ē-man'si-pā-tō-ri), a. [< emancipate + -ory.] Pertaining or relating to emancipation; favoring or giving emancipation: as, an emancipatory judgment, law, or decree.

The first of these [sources] was the emancipatory spirit of the North.

The Atlantic, LVII, 22.

A woman the most averse to any emancipatory ideas concerning her sex can surely identify her name with that most sexy of occupations, needlework.

Philadelphia Times, July 24, 1883.

emancipist (ē-man'si-pist), n. [< F. émancipiste, < émanciper, emancipate: see emancipate and -ist.] A convict in a European penal colony who has been pardoned or emancipated.

There is much jealousy between the children of the rich emancipist [in New South Wales] and the free settlers.

Darwin, Voyage of Beagle, II, 231.

For some time past the free colonists [in the French penal colonies], by no means a numerous class, have declined to employ emancipists, declaring that while they claimed the free man's wages they would not give the free man's work.

Nineteenth Century, XXI, 339.

emandibulate (ē-man-dib'ū-lāt), a. [< L. epriv. + mandibula, mandible: see mandibulate.]

1. In entom., having no mandibles, or having those organs so modified that they cannot be used for grasping or biting, as in the Lepidoptera and most Diptera. This epithet was restricted by Kirby to species of the neuropterous family Phryganeidae, in which the mandibles are soft and very minute, but the maxillæ and labium are well developed.

2. Having no lower jaw, as the lampreys and hags; cyclostomous, as a vertebrate.

emanet (ē-mān'), v. t. [= F. émaner = Sp. Pg. emanar = It. emanare, < L. emanare, flow out, proceed from: see emanate.] To flow out; issue; emanate.

We may seem even to hear the supreme intelligence and eternal soul of all nature give this commission to the spirits which emanated from him.

Sir W. Jones, Mystical Poetry of the Persians and Hindus.

emang, prep. and adv. An obsolete form of among.

emarcid (ē-mār'sid), a. [Irreg. < L. e- + marcidus, withered, after emarcescere, wither away: see marcid.] In bot., flaccid; wilted.

emarginate (ē-mār'ji-nāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. emarginated, ppr. emarginating. [< L. emarginatus, pp. of emarginare, deprive of the edge, < e, out, + margo (margin-), edge, margin: see marginate.] To remove the margin of; deprive of margin.

emarginate (ē-mār'ji-nāt), a. [< L. emarginatus, pp.: see the verb.] Having the margin or extremity taken away. Specifically—(a) In bot., notched at the blunt apex: applied to a leaf, petal, stigma, or to the gills of fungi. (b) In mineral., having all the edges of the primitive form truncated, each by one face. (c) In zool., having the margin broken by a shallow notch or other incurvature; incised; nicked.—Emarginate pronotum, one having the anterior margin concave for the reception of the head, as in many Coleoptera.

emarginated (ē-mār'ji-nāt-ed), p. a. Same as emarginate.

emarginately (ē-mār'ji-nāt-li), adv. In the form of notches.

emargination (ē-mār'ji-nā'shon), n. [< emarginate + -ion.] The act of taking away the margin, or the state or condition of having the margin taken away.

Specifically—(a) In bot., the condition of having a notch at the summit or blunt end, as a leaf or petal: as, the emargination of a leaf. (b) In zool., the state of being emarginate; incision.

Either or both webs [of feathers] may be incised toward the end; this is called emargination. The least appreciable forking [of a bird's tail] is called emargination, and a tail thus shaped is said to be emarginate.

Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, pp. 112, 117.

emarginato-excavate (ē-mār'ji-nā'tō-eks'kāvāt), a. In entom., hollowed out above, the next joint being inserted in the hollow, as a tarsal joint.

Emarginula (ē-mār-jin'ū-lā), n. [NL., as emargin(ate) + -ula.] A genus of keyhole-limpets, of the family Fissurellidae, or made type of a family Emarginulidae, having an emargination of the anterior edge of the deeply cupped shell. E. elongatus, of the Mediterranean, is an example.

Emarginulidæ (ē-mār-jin'ū-lī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Emarginula + -idæ.] A family of keyhole-limpets, typified by the genus Emarginula, separated from the family Fissurellidae.

emarginuliform (ē-mār-jin'ū-lī-fōrm), a. [< NL. Emarginula + L. forma, form.] Resembling a limpet of the genus Emarginula.

emasculate (ē-mas'kū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. emasculated, ppr. emasculating. [< LL. emasculatus, pp. of emasculare, < e, out, + masculus, male: see masculine, male.] 1. To deprive of the male functions; deprive of virility or procreative power; castrate; geld. Hence—2. To deprive of masculine strength or vigor; weaken; render effeminate; vitiate by unmanly softness.

Luxury had not emasculated their minds.

V. Knox, Spirit of Despotism, § 2.

The tastes and habits of civilization, the innumerable inventions designed to promote comfort and diminish pain, set the current of society in a direction altogether different from heroism, and somewhat emasculate, though they refine and soften, the character.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, I, 136.

3. In general, to weaken; destroy the force or strength of; specifically, to weaken or destroy the literary force of, as a book or other writing, by too rigid an expurgation, or by injudicious editing.

McGlashan pruned freely. James abused McGlashan for having emasculated his jokes. N. and Q., 7th ser., VI, 111.

II. intrans. To become unmanned or effeminate.

Through very few, or rather none which have emasculated or turned women, yet very many who from an esteem or reality of being women have infallibly proved men.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii, 17.

emasculate (ē-mas'kū-lāt), a. [< L. emasculatus, pp.: see the verb.] Deprived of the male functions; castrated; hence, unmanned; deprived of vigor.

Thus the harrastr, degenerate, emasculate slave is offended with a jubilee, a manumission.

Hammond, Words, IV, 515.

Catholicism restricts "religion" to its priests and other emasculate orders, and allows the laity no nearness to God but what comes through their intercession.

H. James, Subs. and Shad., p. 211.

emasculation (ē-mas'kū-lā'shon), n. [= *F. émasculation; < L. as if emasculatio(n), < emasculare, emasculate: see emasculate.] 1. The act of depriving a male of the functions which characterize the sex; castration.—2. The act of depriving of vigor or strength; specifically, the act of eliminating or altering parts of a literary work in such a manner as to deprive it of its original force or vividness.

The emasculations [of an edition of "Don Quixote"] were some Scotchman's.

Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote.

3. The state of being emasculated; effeminacy; unmanly weakness.

Emballonura (em-bal-ō-nū-rā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐμβάλλειν, throw in, + οὐρά, tail.] The typical genus of bats of the family Emballonuridae. The tail perforates the interfemoral membrane and appears loose upon the upper surface for a part of its own length, whence the name. There are 2 incisors and 2 premolars in each half of the upper jaw, and 3 incisors and 2 premolars in each half of the lower jaw. The genus contains a few species, distributed from Madagascar through the Malay archipelago.

emballonurid (em-bal-ō-nū-rid), n. A bat of the family Emballonuridae.

Emballonuridæ (em-bal-ō-nū-ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Emballonura + -idæ.] A family of microchiropteran bats, containing about 12 genera and upward of 60 species. They are characterized by the obliquely truncated snout with prominent nostrils, the first phalanx of the middle finger folded in repose above the metacarpal bone, and by the production of the tail far beyond the interfemoral membrane, or the perforation of this membrane by the tail. There is generally a single pair of upper incisors. The family is nearly cosmopolitan, and is divided into Emballonurinae and Molossinae.

Emballonurinae (em-bal'ō-nū-rī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Emballonura + -inæ.] The subfamily of bats typical of the family Emballonuridae, having a slender tail which either perforates Dididurus albus, belonging to the subfamily Emballonurinae.

the interfemoral membrane above or ends in it, weak upper incisors, and long legs with slender fibulae. The leading genera are Furia, Emballonura, Dididurus, Noctilio, and Rhinopoma.

emballonurine (em-bal-ō-nū-rin), a. and n. 1. a. Of or pertaining to the microchiropteran families Emballonuridae and Phyllostomidae. The emballonurine alliance is one of two series into which the Microchiroptera are divided, having the upper incisors approximated and the tail perforating the interfemoral membrane, or produced beyond it. See vespertilionine.

2. n. A member of the emballonurine alliance; an emballonurid or phyllostomid.

embalm (em-bām'), v. t. [Formerly also imbalm; spelling altered as in balm; < ME. enbaumen, enbaumen, < OF. enbaumer, earlier embaumer, embaumer, embauser, embauser, < F. embaumer = Pr. embasmar, embaymar = Sp. Pg. embalsamar = It. imbalsamare, imbalsimare, < ML. imbalsamare, < L. in, in, + balsamum, balsam, balm: see balsam, balm.] 1. To dress or anoint with balm; specifically, to preserve from decay by means of balsams or other aromatic spices; keep from putrefaction by impregnating with spices, gums, and chemicals, as a dead body. The ancient process was to open the body, remove the viscera, and fill the cavities with antiseptic spices and drugs. (See mummy.) In modern times many substances and methods have been employed in embalming, as by injection of arsenical preparations into the blood-vessels, generally with a view only to the preservation of the body for a certain period, as during transportation to a distant point, or instead of refrigeration in hot weather during the ordinary interval before burial.

Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father: and the physicians embalmed Israel.

Gen. i, 2.

Unto this appertained the ancient use of the Jews to embalm the corpse with sweet odours, and to adorn the sepulchres of certain.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v, 75.

Scott, L. of the L., l. 12.

embalmer (em-bā'mér), n. [= F. embaumeur.] One who embalms bodies for preservation.

By this it seemeth that the Romans in Numa's time were not so good embalmers as the Egyptians were.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 171.

embalment (em-bām'ment), n. [= F. embaumement; as embalm + -ment.] 1. The act or process of embalming.

Lord Jefferies ordered the hearseman to carry the corpse to Russell's, an undertaker in Cheapside, and leave it there, till he sent orders for the embalment, which he added should be after the royal manner.

Malone, Dryden, "Account of the Funeral."

2. A substance used in embalming. [Archaic.]

At length we found a faire new Mat, and vnder that two bundles, the one bigger, the other lesse; in the greater we found a great quantity of fine red powder, like a kinde of imbalmment.
Capt. John Smith, True Travels, II. 222.

If I die,

Like sweet embalment round my heart shall lie
This love, this love, this love I have for thee.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 331.

embank (em-bank'), v. t. [Formerly also imbank; < em-1 + bank.] To inclose with a bank; furnish with an embankment; defend or strengthen by banks, mounds, or dikes; bank up.

embankment (em-bank'ment), n. [Formerly also imbankment; < embank + -ment.] 1. The act of surrounding or defending with a bank.—2. A mound, bank, dike, or earthwork raised for any purpose, as to protect land from the inroads of the sea or from the overflow of a river, to carry a canal, road, or railway over a valley, etc.; a levee: as, the Thames embankment in London, England.

Once again the tide had rolled fiercely against the embankment, and borne part of it away.

E. Dowden, Shelley, I. 303.

embarr (em-bär'), v. t.; pret. and pp. embarr'd, ppr. embarring. [Formerly also imbar; < OF. embarrer, embarrer, bar, set bars on, bar in, < em-1 + barrer, bar: see em-1 and bar-1.] 1. To bar; close or fasten with a bar; make fast.—2. To inclose so as to hinder egress or escape; bar up or in.

Fast embarr'd in mighty brazen wall.

Spenser, F. Q., I. vii. 44.

She [the ship] was by their agreement stolen out of the harbor, where she had been long embarr'd. See sea,

Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 88.

3. To stop; obstruct; bar out.

The first great judgment of God upon the ambition of man was the confusion of tongues; whereby the open trade and intercourse of learning and knowledge was chiefly imbarred.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 64.

embarge† (em-bärj'), v. t. [< em-1 + barge.] To put or go on board a barge.

Triumphal music from the flood arose,

As when the sovereign we embarg'd did see,

And by faire London for his pleasure rowes.
Dryden, Legend of Robert.

embarge†, v. t. See embarkation.

embargo (em-bär'gō), n. [Formerly also imbargo; = D. G. Dan. Sw. embargo = F. embargo = It. imbarco, < Sp. embargo, an embargo, seizure, arrest (= Pg. embargo, embargo, objection, = Fr. embarg, embarc), < embargar (= Pg. embargar), arrest, restrain, detain, impede, seize, lay an embargo on, < ML. as if imbaricare*, block up, embar, < L. in, in, in-2 + ML. barra, a bar: see bar-1, and cf. barricade, embar, embarras.] 1. A stoppage or seizure of ships or merchandise by sovereign authority; specifically, a restraint or prohibition imposed by the authorities of a country on merchant vessels, or other ships, to prevent their leaving its ports, and sometimes amounting to an interdiction of commercial intercourse either with a particular country or with all countries. The sequestration by a nation of vessels or goods of its own citizens or subjects, for public uses, is sometimes called a civil embargo, in contradistinction to a general prohibition from leaving port intended to affect the trade or naval operations of another nation, called international embargo.

Embargoes on merchandise was another engine of royal power, by which the English princes were able to extort money from the people. Hume, Hist. Eng., V., App. iii.

An embargo . . . is, in its special sense, a detention of vessels in a port, whether they be national or foreign, whether for the purpose of employing them and their crews in a naval expedition, as was formerly practised, or for political purposes, or by way of reprisal.

Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, § 114.

Hence—2. A restraint or hindrance imposed on anything: as, to lay an embargo on free speech.

Her embargo of silence.

Bushnell, Sermons on Living Subjects, I. 34.

The chill embargo of the snow

Was melted in the genial glow.

Whittier, Snow-Bound.

Embargo acts, United States statutes forbidding the clearing of merchant vessels from any United States port excepting by special permission of the President. The most celebrated is that of 1807, amended in 1808 (2 Stat., 451 and 453), passed to counterveil the Berlin and Milan decrees of Napoleon I. and the British orders in council, by which France and Great Britain, then at war, intimated a right to interfere with and control neutral merchant vessels, whether carrying articles contraband of war or not. Similar acts were passed in 1812 (2 Stat., 700) and 1813 (3 Stat., 88).

embargo (em-bär'gō), v. t. [< embargo, n.] To lay an embargo upon; restrain the movement or voluntary use of, as ships or property, especially as an act of sovereignty or of public policy; make a seizure or arrestment of. See embargo, n.

embarguet, n. [< embargo, n.] An embargo.

To make an Embarguet of any Stranger's Ship that rides within his Ports upon all Occasions.

Hovell, Letters, I. iii. 11.

embarguet (em-bär'g), v. t. [Also, less prop., embarge; < embargo, v.] To embargo.

The first, to know if there were any warres betwene Spaine and England. The second, why our merchants with their goods were embarg'd or arrested.

Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 555.

Howsoever, in respect of the king's departure (at which time they use here to embarge all the mules, and means of carriage in this town), I believe his lordship will not begin his journey so soon as he intended.

Cabbala, Sir Wm. Alston to Sec. Conway.

It was no voluntary but a constrained Act in the English, who, being in the Persian's Port, were suddenly embargued for the Service [for the taking of Ormus].

Hovell, Letters, I. iii. 11.

embarguement, n. See embarguement.

embark (em-bärk'), v. [Formerly also embarque and imbar; < OF. (and F.) embarquer = Sp. Pg. embarcar = It. imbarcare, < L. in, in, + ML. barca, a bark: see bar-3.] 1. trans. 1. To put on board a ship or other vessel: as, the general embarked his troops and their baggage.

Sidan fled to Saff, and embarkes his two hundred women in a Flemming; his riches, in a Marsilian.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 632.

We went on to the South Sea Coast, and there embarked our selves in such Canoas and Periago's as our Indian friends furnished us withal. Dampier, Voyages, I. iii., Int.

The French have embarked Fitz-James's regiment at Ostend for Scotland.

Walpole, Letters, II. 6.

Hence—2. To place or venture; put at use or risk, as by investment; put or send forth, as toward a destination: as, he embarked his capital in the scheme.

I am sorry

I e'er embarked myself in such a business.

B. Jonson, Alchemist, i. 1.

I suppose thee to be one who hath embarg'd many prayers for the success of the Gospel in these darke corners of the earth.

T. Shepard, Clear Sunshine of the Gospel, To the Reader.

I know not whether he can be called a good subject who does not embark some part of his fortune with the state, to whose vigilance he owes the security of the whole.

Steele, Spectator, No. 346.

II. intrans. 1. To go on board ship, as when setting out on a voyage: as, the troops embarked for Lisbon.

On the 14 of September I inbarked in another English ship.

Sandys, Travels, p. 7.

Another embarkation of Jesuits was sent from Lisbon to Civita Vecchia.

Smollett, Hist. Eng., III. xiii.

3. The vessel on which something is embarked.

[Rare.]

We must have seen something like a hundred of these embarkations [canal-barges] in the course of that day's paddle, ranged one after another like the houses in a street.

R. L. Stevenson, Inland Voyage, p. 109.

embarkment (em-bärk'ment), n. [Formerly also imbarkment, embarguement, imbarquement (and embarguement, q. v.); < OF. (and F.) embarquement (= Pg. embarcamento = It. imbarcamento), < embarquer, embark: see embark.] The act of embarking; embarkation.

He removed from his Cuman to his Pompelan villa, beyond Naples, which, not being so commodious for an embarkment, would help to lessen the suspicion of his intended flight. Middleton, Life of Cicero, ii. 259 (Ord MS.).

embarmen† (em-bär'ment), n. [< embar + -ment.] An embargo. Halliwell.

A true report of the general embarmen of all English shippes.

Title of a Tract (1584).

embarquement, n. [Occurring in the following passage in Shakspeare, where some editions have embarguement; < OF. embarguement, taking ship, putting into a ship, loading: see embarkment. Embargo does not appear to have been in use in any form in Shakspeare's time.] A word of uncertain meaning (perhaps a loading, burdening, restraint) in the following passage:

The prayers of priests, nor times of sacrifice,

Embarquements [var. embarguements] all of fury.

Shak., Cor., i. 10.

embarras (on-ba-rä'), n. [F.] See embarrass.

embarrass (em-bär'as), v. t. [< F. embarrasser, encumber, obstruct, block up, entangle, perplex (= Sp. embarazar = Pg. embaraçar = It. imbarazzare, embarrass), < L. in, in, + F. barras*, Pr. barras, a bar; cf. Sp. barras, a prison, prop. pl. of Pr. Sp., etc., barra, F. barre, a bar. Cf. embar, embargo, and debarress, disembarrass.] 1. To hamper or impede as with entanglements; encumber; render intricate or difficult; beset with difficulties; confuse or perplex, as conflicting circumstances, pecuniary complications, etc.: as, public affairs are embarrassed; want of order tends to embarrass business; the merchant is embarrassed by the unfavorable state of the market, or by his liabilities.

embering-dayst (em'bēr-ing-dāz), n. pl. The ember-days.

Divers of the king's subjects have of late more than in times past broken and contemned such abstinence, which hath been used in this realm upon the Fridays and Saturdays, the embering-days, and other days commonly called vigils. Quoted by Hallam.

Emberiza (em-be-rī'zā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus; earlier in Kilian, 1598), < G. dial. (Swiss) embitze, emmeritz, equiv. to MHG. amerinc, ämérinc, G. emmering, ämmering (= MD. emmerinc), G. also emmerling, ämmerling (= MD. emmerlinck), a bunting, dim. of OHG. amero, MHG. amer, G. ammer, a bunting, = AS. amere, E. ammer*, hammer, in yellowhammer: see yellowhammer.] A genus of buntings, cinerous passerine birds of the family Fringillidae, such as the common corn-bunting of Europe (E. miliaria), the yellow bunting (E. citrinella), the ciril-bunting (E. cirilis), the ortolan (E. hortulana), etc. The limits of the genus are indefinite, and the term has no more exact meaning than bunting (which see). In a late restricted sense it includes more than 50 species, confined to the Palearctic, Indian, and Ethiopian regions. None of the very many North and South American buntings which have been called Emberiza properly belong to this genus. See Emberizinae, and cuts under bunting and cin-bunting.

Emberizidæ (em-be-rīz-id-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Emberiza + -idæ.] The buntings rated as a family of cinerous passerine birds.

Emberizinae (em-be-rīz-i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Emberiza + -inae.] The true buntings rated as a subfamily of Fringillidae. The group is probably inusceptible of zoological definition. It has of late been made one of three subfamilies of Fringillidae (the others being Coccothraustinae and Fringillinae), having the nasal bones short, not extended backward beyond the fore border of the orbits, the mandibular tomia not continuous throughout, leaving a gap in the commissural line of the bill, and the gonysoidal angle well marked. In such acceptance, the Emberizinae include about 50 genera, of most parts of the world, represented by many of the most common buntings, finches, and "sparrows" of English-speaking countries, especially of the United States, as the chip-, snow-, and vesper-bird, lark-finch, lark-and towhee-bunting, black-throated bunting, white-throated and white-crowned sparrows, field-, fox-, song-, swamp-, and savannah-sparrows, the longspurs, etc. See Emberiza.

emberizine (em-be-rī'zin), a. [< NL. emberizinus: see Emberizinae.] Of or pertaining to the genus Emberiza; related to or resembling a bunting. Coues.

Emberizoides (em-be-rī-zoi'dēz), n. [NL. (C. J. Temminck, 1824), < Emberiza + Gr. eidōs, form.] A notable genus of South American fringilline birds with long acuminate tail-feathers, typical species of which are E. macrura and E. sphenura. Also called Tardivola.

Embernagra (em-bēr-nā-grā), n. [NL. (R. P. Lesson, 1831), < Ember (iza) + (Ta)nagra.] A Texas Sparrow (Embernagra rufocincta).

genus of fringilline birds, related to Pipilo, having green as the principal color, the wings and tail much rounded, of equal length, the tarsus moderate, and the toes short; the American greenfinches. The Texas sparrow or greenfinch is E. rufovirgata, a common species in the lower Rio Grande valley. Also called Linnaea.

embertide (em-bér-tid'), n. [ember + tide.] One of the seasons in which ember-days occur.

ember-week (em-bér-wēk'), n. [ME. ymber-weke, umbrī-wike, < AS. ymbren-wice: see ember- and week.] A week in which ember-days fall.

And are all fallen into fasting-days and Ember-weeks, that cooks are out of use? Massinger, The Old Law, iii. 1.

Constant she keeps her Ember-week and Lent.
Prior, The Modern Saint.

embesyt, v. t. Same as embusy. Skelton.

embetter (em-bet-ér'), v. t. [em-1 + better.] To make better.

For cruelty doth not embetter men,
But them more wary make than they have been.
Daniel, Chorus in Philotas.

embezzle (em-bez'z'l), v. t.; [pret. and pp. embezzled, ppr. embezzling.] [Early mod. E. (16th cent.) imbezzle, imbezel, embesyll, embecyll, imbesel, imbesel, imbezil, imbecill, etc., weaken, diminish, filch, < imbecile (accented on 2d syll.), < OF. imbecille, weak, feeble: see imbecile, and cf. bezzle.] 1. To weaken; diminish the power or extent of.

And so imbecill all their strengthe that they are naught to me.
Drant, tr. of Horace's Satires, i. 6.

The seconde plage of the seconde angell, as the seconde judgemente of God against the regiment of Rome, and this is imbesynge and dimynishe of their power and dominion, many landes and people fallynge from them.
J. Udall, Revelations of St. John, xvi.

2. To waste or dissipate in extravagance; misappropriate or misspend.

I do not like that this unthrifty youth should embezzle away the money.

J. Udall, tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus, § 83.

The Jewels, rich apparell, presents, gold, silver, costly furies, and such like, were conveyed away, concealed, and vterly embezzled.
Hakluyt's Voyages, i. 286.

4. To appropriate fraudulently to one's own use, as what is intrusted to one's care; apply to one's private use by a breach of trust, as a clerk or servant who misappropriates his employer's money or valuables.

He accused several citizens who had been entrusted with public money with embezzling it. J. Adams, Works, V. 25.

5. To confuse; amaze.

They came where Sancho was, astonished and embezzled with what he heard and saw.
Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote (1652), fol. 158, back.

embezzlement (em-bez'z'l-ment'), n. [< embezzle + -ment.] The act of embezzling; specifically, the act by which a clerk, servant, or other person occupying a position of trust fraudulently appropriates to his own use the money or goods intrusted to his care; a criminal conversion; the appropriation to one's self by a breach of trust of the property or money of another; "a sort of statutory larceny, committed by servants and other like persons where there is a trust reposed, and therefore no trespass, so that the act would not be larceny at the common law" (Bishop).

To remove doubts which had existed respecting embezzlements by merchants and bankers' clerks, it was enacted, by the 39 George III. ch. 85, that if any servant or clerk should by virtue of his employment receive any money, bills, or any valuable security, goods or effects, in the name or on the account of his master or employer, and should afterwards embezzle any part of the same, he shall be deemed to have feloniously stolen the same, and should be subject to transportation for any term not exceeding fourteen years.

Blackstone, Com., IV. xvii., note 3.

Embezzlement is distinguished from larceny, properly so called, as being committed in respect of property which is not, at the time, in the actual or legal possession of the owner.
Burrill.

embezzler (em-bez'z'l-er), n. One who embezzles.

Embia (em-bi-ä'), n. [NL.] The typical genus of the family Embiidae. E. savignii is an Egyptian species.

embiid (em-bi-id'), n. One of the Embiidae.

Embiidae (em-bi-i-dē'), n. pl. [NL., < Embia + -idae.] A small family of neuropterous (pseudoneuropterous) insects, of the group Corrodentia, related to the Psocidae, characterized by the narrow depressed body, head distinct from the thorax, many-jointed moniliform antennae, 3-jointed tarsi, and few-veined wings of equal size. They are small phytophagous insects; their larvae are found under stones in silken galleries. By some they are referred to the Orthoptera. The leading genera are Embia, Olynthia, and Oligotoma. Also written Embiide.

embillow (em-bil'ō'), v. i. [< em-1 + billow.] To heave, as the waves of the sea; swell. [Rare.]

And then embillowed high doth in his pride disdain
With fume and roaring till all hugeness of the maine.
Lisle, tr. of Du Bartas's First Booke of Noe.

Embiotoca (em-bi-ot'ō-kā'), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐμβιος, being in life, living (< ἐν, in, + βίος, life), + τέκεν, τεκεῖν, bring forth (> τόκος, offspring).] The typical genus of the family Embiotocidae. L. Agassiz, 1853.

embiotocid (em-bi-ot'ō-sid'), n. One of the Embiotocidae.

Embiotocidae (em-bi-ō-tos-i-dē'), n. pl. [NL., < Embiotoca + -idae.] A family of viviparous acanthopterygian fishes, related to the labroids; the surf-fishes, in the widest sense. They are of ordinary compressed oval form, like the white perch, and have cycloid scales, lateral line continuous and parallel with the back, head and mouth small, with jaw-teeth only, the single dorsal fin 8 to 18-spined, folding into a groove in the back, and the anal fin long and 8-spined. They are mostly small fishes, the largest only 18 inches long, the smallest 4 or 5. All are viviparous, a remarkable fact first made known to science in 1853; 10 to 20 young are born at a litter. Nearly all are marine, abounding on the Pacific coast of the United States, where they are among the inferior food-fishes, and are called perches, porgies, shiners, etc. About 20 species, referred to about a dozen genera, are now known. Of these species 17 are confined to the Pacific coast waters of North America, and one is peculiar to the fresh waters of California. The marine species belong to the subfamily Embiotocinae, the fresh-water species to the subfamily Hysteroecarpinae. The family has also been called Ditremitidae, Ditremita, Holcomoti, and Holcomotidae. See cut under Ditremitidae.

Embiotocinae (em-bi-ot'ō-si-nē'), n. pl. [NL., < Embiotoca + -inae.] The surf-fishes proper, or marine embiotocoids, the typical subfamily of Embiotocidae, with the spinous portion of the dorsal shorter than the soft part, and having only from 8 to 11 spines.

embiotocine (em-bi-ot'ō-sin'), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Embiotocinae.

II. n. A fish of the subfamily Embiotocinae.

embiotocoid (em-bi-ot'ō-koid'), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Embiotocidae.

II. n. A viviparous fish of the family Embiotocidae; one of the surf-fishes.

embitter (em-bit'ér'), v. t. [Formerly also im-bitter; < em-1 + bitter.] 1. To make bitter or more bitter. [Rare in the literal sense.]

One grain of bad embitters all the best.

Dryden, Illad, i. 775.

2. To affect with bitterness or unhappiness; make distressful or grievous; as, the sins of youth often embitter old age.

Is there anything that more embitters the enjoyments of this life than shame? South, Sermons.

Stern Powers who make their care

To embitter human life, malignant Deities.

M. Arnold, Empedocles on Etna.

To open the door of escape to those who live in contention would not necessarily embitter the relations of those who are happy. N. A. Rev., CXCXIX. 240.

3. To render more violent or malignant; exasperate.

Men, the most embittered against each other by former contests. Bancroft.

embitterer (em-bit'ér-er'), n. One who or that which embitters.

The fear of death has always been considered as the greatest enemy of human quiet, the polluter of the feast of happiness, and the embitterer of the cup of joy.

Johnson.

embitterment (em-bit'ér-ment'), n. [< embitter + -ment.] The act of embittering.

The commotions, terrors, expectations, and embitterments of repentance.

Plutarch, Morals (trans.), iv. 155 (Ord MS.).

emblanch (em-blanch'), v. t. [*< ME. emblauchen, < OF. emblanchir, emblauchen, em-blancir, whiten, < en- + blanchir, whiten, < blanc, white: see en- and blanch.] To whiten.

It was impossible that a spot of so deep a dye should be emblanch'd. Heylin, Life of Laud, p. 260.

emblaze (em-bláz'), v. t.; [pret. and pp. emblazed, ppr. emblazing.] [< em-1 + blaze.] 1. To kindle; set in a blaze.

Works damnd, or to be damnd (your father's fault)!

Go, purified by flames, ascend the sky.

Not sulphur-tipp'd, emblaze an alehouse fire.

Pope, Dunciad, i. 235.

2. To adorn with glittering embellishments; cause to glitter or shine.

The unsought diamonds

Would so emblaze the forehead of the deep,
And so bestud with stars, that they below
Would grow inured to light. Milton, Comus, l. 733.

No weeping orphan saw his father's stores
Our shrines irradiate, or emblaze the floors.

Pope, Eloisa to Abelard, l. 136.

And forked flames emblaze the blackening storm.
J. Barlow, Vision of Columbus, viii.

3. To display or set forth conspicuously or ostentatiously; blazon.

But thou shalt wear it as a herald's coat,
To emblaze the honour that thy master got.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 10.

Stout Hercules

Emblaz'd his trophies on two posts of brass.

Greene, Orlando Furioso.

emblazon (em-blā'zon'), v. [< em-1 + blazon.]

I. trans. 1. To adorn with figures of heraldry or ensigns armorial: as, a shield emblazoned with armorial bearings.

Boys paraded the streets, bearing banners emblazoned with the arms of Aragon. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 3.

2. To depict or represent, as an armorial ensign on a shield.

My shield, . . .
On which when Cupid, with his killing bow
And cruel shafts, emblazon'd she beheld,
At sight thereof she was with terror quell'd.

Spenser, F. Q., IV. x. 55.

3. To set off with ornaments; decorate; illuminate.

Ere heaven's emblazon'd by the rosy dawn,
Domestic cares awake him. J. Phillips, Cider, ii.

The walls were . . . emblazoned with legends in commemoration of the illustrious pair. Prescott.

Those stories of courage and sacrifice which emblazon the annals of Greece and Rome. Sumner, Orations, i. 12.

4. To celebrate in laudatory terms; sing the praises of.

We find Augustus . . . emblazoned by the poets.
Hakewill, Apology.

Heroes emblazoned high to fame.

Longfellow, tr. of Coplas de Manrique.

You whom the fathers made free and defended,
Stain not the scroll that emblazons their fame!

O. W. Holmes, Never or Now.

II. intrans. To blaze forth; shine out.

Th' englad'den'd spring, forgetful now to weep,
Began t' emblazon from her heavy bed.

G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph after Death.

emblazoner (em-blā'zon-er'), n. 1. One who emblazons; a herald.—2. A decorator; an illuminator; one who practises ornamentation.

I step again to this emblazoner of his title-page, . . . and here I find him pronouncing, without reprieve, those animadversions to be a slanderous and scurrilous libel. Milton, Apology for Smeectynnus.

emblazonment (em-blā'zon-ment'), n. [< emblazon + -ment.] 1. The act of emblazoning.—2. That which is emblazoned. Imp. Dict.

emblazonry (em-blā'zon-ri'), n. [< emblazon + -ry.] 1. The act or art of emblazoning.—2. Heraldic decoration, as pictures or figures upon shields, standards, etc.

Who saw the Banner reared on high
In all its dread emblazonry.

Wordsworth, White Doe of Rylstone, iii.

Thine ancient standard's rich emblazonry.

Abp. Trench, Gibraltar.

emblem (em-blem'), n. [= D. emblem = G. Dan. Sw. emblem; < OF. embleme, F. emblème = Sp. Pg. emblema = It. emblema, < L. emblema, pl. emblemata, raised ornaments on vessels, tessellated work, mosaic, < Gr. ἐμβλημα(-), an insertion (L. sense not recorded in Gr.), < ἐμβάλλω, put in, lay on, < ἐν, in, + βάλλω, cast, throw, put.] 1. That which is put in or on inlaid work; inlay; inlaid or mosaic work; something ornamental inserted in another body.

Under foot the violet,

Crocus, and hyacinth, with rich inlay
Broider'd the ground, more colour'd than with stone
Of costliest emblem. Milton, P. L., iv. 703.

2. A symbolical design or figure with explanatory writing; a design or an image suggesting some truth or fact; the expression of a thought or idea both in design and in words; as, Quarles's Emblems (a collection of such representations).

Emblem reduceth conceits intellectual to images sensible. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 232.

3. Any object whose predominant quality symbolizes something else, as another quality, condition, state, and the like; the figure of such an object used as a symbol; an allusive figure; a symbol: as, a white robe is an emblem of purity; a balance, of justice; a crown, of royalty.

The emblems in use during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries are sometimes hard to discriminate from the devices; for these, as adopted by men of distinction, were commonly emblematic. See device, 7.

Know ye the land where the cypress and myrtle
Are emblems of deeds that are done in their clime?
Byron, Bride of Abydos, l. 1.

A fit emblem, both of the events in memory of which it is raised, and of the gratitude of those who have reared it.
D. Webster, Speech, Bunker Hill, June 17, 1825.

4. An example. [Rare.]

(Lord's Day) Comes Mr. Herbert, Mr. Honiwood's man, and dined with me—a very honest, plain, and well-meaning man, I think him to be; and, by his discourse and manner of life, the true emblem of an old ordinary serving-man.
Pepys, Diary, II. 159.

=Syn. 2 and 3. Emblem, Symbol, Type. Emblem and symbol refer to tangible objects; type may refer also to an act, as when the lifting up of the brazen serpent (Num. xxi. 8, 9) is said to be a type of the crucifixion, the serpent being a type or emblem of Christ. A symbol is generally an emblem which has become recognized or standard among men; a volume proposing new signs of this sort would be called a "book of emblems"; but an emblem may be a symbol, as the bread and wine at the Lord's supper are more often called emblems than symbols of Christ's death. Symbol is by this rule the appropriate word for the conventional signs in mathematics. Emblem is most often used of moral and religious matters, and type chiefly of religious doctrines, institutions, historical facts, etc. Type in its religious application generally points forward to an antitype.

Rose of the desert! thou art to me

An emblem of stainless purity.

D. M. Moir, The White Rose.

All things are symbols: the external shows

Of nature have their image in the mind.

Longfellow, The Harvest Moon.

Beauty was lent to Nature as the type

Of heaven's unspeakable and holy joy.

S. J. Hale, Beauty.

emblem (em'blem), v. t. [< emblem, n.] To represent or suggest by an emblem or symbolically; symbolize; emblemize. [Rare.]

Why may he not be emblem'd by the cozening fig-tree that our Saviour curs'd?
Fetham, Resolves, l. 80.

emblema (em-blé'mä), n.; pl. emblemata (-mä'tä). [L.: see emblem.] In archæol.: (a) An inlaid emblem or ornament; an ornament in mosaic. (b) An ornament in relief made of some precious metal, fastened upon the surface of a vessel or an article of furniture.

In another class of jewels animals or the human figure were not relieved on a ground, but embossed and cut out in outline, like the emblemata of later Greek art.

C. T. Newton, Art and Archæol., p. 265.

emblematic, emblematical (em-ble-mat'ik, -i-kal), a. [= F. emblématique = Sp. emblemático = Pg. It. emblematico (cf. D. G. emblematisch = Dan. Sw. emblematisk), < L. as if "emblematicus," < emblema, emblem: see emblem.] 1. Pertaining to or constituting an emblem; using or dealing in emblems; symbolic.

And wet his brow with hallowed wine,

And on his finger given to shine

The emblematic gem. Scott, Marmion, iv. 8.

And so, because the name (like many names) can be made to yield a fanciful emblematic meaning, Homer must be a myth.
De Quincey, Homer, i.

2. Representative by some allusion or customary association; suggestive through similarity of qualities or conventional significance: as, a crown is emblematic of royalty; whiteness is emblematic of purity.

Glanced at the legendary Amazon

As emblematic of a nobler age.

Tennyson, Princess, ii.

emblematically (em-ble-mat'ik-al-i), adv. In an emblematic way; by way or means of emblems; in the manner of emblems; by way of allusive representation.

Others have spoken emblematically and hieroglyphically; and so did the Egyptians, unto whom the phoenix was the hieroglyphick of the sun.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 12.

He took a great stone and put it up under the oak, emblematically joining the two great elements of masonry.
Swift.

emblematicness (em-ble-mat'ik-al-nes), n. The character of being emblematic. Bailey, 1727.

emblematicize (em-ble-mat'ik-siz), v. t.; pret. and pp. emblematicized, ppr. emblematicizing. [< emblematic + -ize.] To represent by or embody in an emblem; emblemize. [Rare.]

He [Giacomo Amiconi] drew the queen and the three eldest princesses, and prints were taken from his pictures, which he generally endeavoured to emblematicize by genii and cupids.
Walpole, Anecdotes of Painting, iv. 3.

emblematist (em'blem-a-tist), n. [< L. emblema(-t-), emblem, + -ist.] A writer or an inventor of emblems.

Thus began the descriptions of griffins, basilisks, phoenix, and many more; which emblematicists and heralds have entertained with significations answering their institutions.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 20.

Alciato, the famous lawyer and emblemist.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 138.

emblematize (em'blem-a-tiz), v. t.; pret. and pp. emblematized, ppr. emblematizing. [< L. emblema(-t-), emblem, + -ize.] To represent or express by means of an emblem: as, to emblematize a thought, a quality, or the like.

Anciently the sun was emblemized by a starry figure.

Bp. Hurd, Marks of Imitation.

emblemment (em'ble-ment), n. [< OF. emblaiement, emblaiement, crop, harvest, < emblaer, embleer, emblaier, embloyer, also emblaer (also, without prefix, blaer, bleer, blayer), F. embler (= It. imbiadare), < ML. imbladare, sow with grain, < L. in, in, + ML. bladum (> OF. ble, bleer, bles, bled, F. blé, bled = Pr. blat = It. biado, biada), grain (orig. crop, as that which is taken away), orig. "ablative, neut. of L. ablat-ur, pp. of auferre, carry away: see ablative.]

1. pl. In law, those annual agricultural products which demand culture, as distinguished from those which grow spontaneously; crops which require annual planting, or, like hops, annual training and culture. Emblems thus include corn, potatoes, and most garden vegetables, but not fruits, and generally not grass. They are deemed personal property, and pass as such to the executor or administrator of the occupier, instead of going with the land to his heir, if he die before he has cut, reaped, or harvested them; they also belong to the tenant when his tenancy has been terminated by an unexpected event without his agency, as by his death or that of his landlord.

If a tenant for his own life sows the lands, and dies before harvest, his executors shall have the emblems, or profits of the crop.
Blackstone, Comm., II. 8.

2. The right to such crops. — Emblems Act, an English statute of 1851 (14 and 15 Vict., c. 25), which enacted that, instead of having a right to emblems, a tenant under a tenant for life, on the determination of the tenancy, shall hold until the expiration of the then current year; that growing crops sown under execution shall be liable for accruing rent; that the tenant may remove his improvements unless the landlord elect to take them; and that in case a tithe-rent charge is unpaid the landlord may pay it and recover as on a simple contract.

emblemize (em'ble-miz), v. t.; pret. and pp. emblemized, ppr. emblemizing. [< emblem + -ize.] Same as emblematize. Also spelled emblemise.

The demon lovers who seduce women to their ruin at once emblemize and punish the evil thoughts and feelings of their victims.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII. 562.

ebloom (em-blóm'), v. t. [< em-1 + bloom-1.] To cover or enrich with bloom. [Rare.]

eblossom (em-blos'um), v. t. [< em-1 + blossom-1.] To cover with blossoms. [Poetical.]

Sweet, O sweet, the warbling throng,

On the white eblossom'd spray!

Nature's universal song under execution shall be

Echoes to the rising day.

Cunningham, Day, A Pastoral.

embodier (em-bod'i-ér), n. One who or that which embodies; one who gives form to anything. Formerly also imbodier.

He [Shakspeare] must have been perfectly conscious of his genius, and of the great trust he imposed upon his native tongue as the embodier and perpetrator of it.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 165.

embodiment (em-bod'i-ment), n. [Formerly also imbodiment; < embody + -ment.] 1. Investment with or manifestation through an animate body; incarnation; bodily presentation: as, metempsychosis is the supposed embodiment of previously existing souls in new forms; she is an embodiment of all the virtues.

The theory of embodiment serves several highly important purposes in savage and barbarian philosophy.

E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II. 113.

2. A bringing into or presentation in or through a form; formal expression or manifestation; formulation: as, the embodiment of principles in a treatise.

A visible memory of the past, and a sparkling embodiment of the present.
Lathrop, Spanish Vistas, p. 104.

Multiform embodiments of selfishness in unjust laws.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 451.

He [the Sultan] has no rights, for wrong can have no rights, and his whole position is the embodiment of wrong.
E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 415.

3. Collection or formation into an aggregate body; organization; an aggregate whole; incorporation; concentration: as, the embodiment of troops into battalions, brigades, divisions, etc.; the embodiment of a country's laws.

Our own Common Law is mainly an embodiment of the "customs of the realm."
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 529.

embody (em-bod'i), v.; pret. and pp. embodied, ppr. embodying. [Formerly also imbod; < em-1 + body-1.] 1. trans. 1. To invest with an animate body; lodge in a physical form; incarnate; hence, to give form to; formulate; coördinate the elements or principles of; express, arrange, or exemplify intelligibly or perceptibly: as, to embody thought in words; legislation is embodied in statutes; architecture is embodied art.

At this turn, sir, you may perceive that I have again made use of the Platonick hypothesis, that Spirits are embodied.
Glennville, Witchcraft, § 11.

The soul while it is embodied can no more be divided from sin, than the body itself can be considered without flesh.
South, Sermons, XI. 1.

Morals can never be safely embodied in the constable.

Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 56.

Doctrines, we are afraid, must generally be embodied before they can excite a strong public feeling. Macaulay.

Even among ourselves embodied righteousness sometimes takes the same abstract form.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 388.

2. To form or collect into a body or united mass; collect into a whole; incorporate; organize; concentrate: as, to embody troops; to embody scattered traditions or folk-lore.

Recorded among the visits of kings and ambassadors in a precious chronicle that embodied the annals of all public events and copies of public documents.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 145.

We shall be able to fall back upon the Militia battalions, which will be at once embodied, and through whose ranks will be poured into the fighting ranks of the active army a continual supply of drilled and disciplined recruits.
Nineteenth Century, XIX. 269.

=Syn. 2. To combine, compact, integrate, comprehend, comprise.

II. intrans. To unite into a body, mass, or collection; coalesce.

The idea of white, which snow yielded yesterday, and another idea of white from another snow to-day, put together in your mind, embody and run into one. Locke.

To embody against this court party and its practices.

Burke, Present Discontents.

embog (em-bog'), v. t.; pret. and pp. embogged, ppr. embogging. [< em-1 + bog-1.] To plunge into or cause to stick in a bog; mire.

General Murray . . . got into a mistake and a morass, . . . was enclosed embogged, and defeated.

Walpole, Letters (1760), III. 392.

It would be calamitous for us, a propos of this matter, to get embogged in a metaphysical discussion about what real unity and continuity are.
W. James, Mind, IX. 6.

embogue (em-bóg'), v. i.; pret. and pp. embogued, ppr. emboguing. [< Sp. embocar, enter by the mouth, or by a pass or narrow passage, = Pg. embocar, get into the mouth of a passage, = It. imboccare, feed, instruct, disembogue, = F. emboucher, put into the mouth, refl. disembogue, embogue (> embouchure, q. v.), < L. in (> Sp. en, etc.), in, + bucca, the cheek (> Sp. boca, Pg. bocca, It. bocca, F. bouche, the mouth): see bucca, and cf. disembogue.] To discharge itself, as a river, at its mouth; disembogue; debouch. [Rare or unused.]

embolt (em-boil'), v. [< em-1 + boil-1.] 1. trans. To heat; cause to burn, as with fever.

Faynt, wearie, sore, embolyed, grieved, brent,
With heat, toyle, wounds, armes, smart, and inward fire,
That never man such mischiefs did torment.

Spenser, F. Q., I. xi. 28.

II. intrans. To boil violently; hence, to rage with pride or anger.

The knight embolying in his haughtie hart,

Knitt all his forces.

Spenser, F. Q., II. iv. 9.

emboitement (on-bwot'mon), n. [F., a jointing, a fitting in, etc. (see def.), < embotter, joint, fit in, lock (step), OF. emboister, lit. inclose as in a box: see emboss.] In biol., the doctrine of generation promulgated by Bonnet, namely, the aggregation of living germs one within the other, and their detachment to produce new existences.

embola, n. Plural of embolus.

embolæmia, n. See embolism.

embold (em-bôld'), v. t. [< em-1 + bold.] To embolden.

But now we dare not shew our selfe in place,

Ne vs embold to dwell in company

There as our hert would loue right faithfully.

Court of Love.

embolden (em-bôl'dn), v. t. [< em-1 + bold + -en-1.] To give boldness or courage to; make bolder; encourage.

With these Persuasions they [Richard and Geoffrey] pass over into Normandy, and join with their Brother Henry, who, emboldened by their Assistance, grows now more insolent than he was before.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 54.

It is generally seen among Privateers that nothing emboldens them sooner to mutiny than want.

Dampier, Voyages, I. 146.

Fame . . . so gentle, so retiring, that it seemed no more than an assured and emboldened modesty.

Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 54.

emboldener (em-bôl'dn-ér), n. One who or that which emboldens.

embolemia, embolemia (em-bō-lē-mī-ā), n. [NL. embolemia, < Gr. ἐμβόλιος, thrown in (see embolemism, embolemus), + αἷμα, blood.] The condition of the blood accompanying the formation of metabolic abscesses in pyemia.

Embolemus, n. See Embolemus.

embolia¹ (em-bō-lī-ā), n.; pl. embolice (-ē). [NL., < Gr. ἐμβολή, insertion: see embolemism.] Same as embolemism.

embolia², n. Plural of embolemus.

embolic (em-bol'ik), a. [< embolemus, or emboly, + -ic.] 1. Inserted; intercalated; embolismic.—2. In pathol., relating to embolism, or plugging of a blood-vessel.—3. Pertaining to emboly; characterized by or resulting from emboly.

The two-layered gastrula is a rule developed from the blastosphere by . . . emboly invagination. Claus, Zoology (trans.), I, 114.

Twelve lunations form a common year, and thirteen the embolismic year. Grosier, China (trans.).

The [Hebrew] year is luni-solar, and, according as it is ordinary or embolismic, consists of twelve or thirteen lunar months, each of which has 29 or 30 days. Encyc. Brit., IV, 677.

embolemism (em-bō-liz'mus), n. [LL. embolemismus, insertion, intercalation: see embolemism.] Same as embolemism, 4.

The Lord's Prayer is followed, in almost all Liturgies, by a short petition against temptation, . . . which . . . was anciently known by the name of the Embolemismus. J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I, 514.

embolite (em'bō-lit), n. [< Gr. ἐμβολή, an insertion (< ἐμβάλλειν, throw in, insert), + -ite.] A mineral consisting chiefly of the chlorid of silver and the bromide of silver, found in Chili and Mexico; so called because intermediate between cerargyrite and bromyrite.

embolium (em-bō-li-um), n.; pl. embolia (-i-ā). [NL., < Gr. ἐμβόλιον, something thrown in, < ἐμβόλιος, thrown in: see embolemus.] An outer or marginal part of the corium found in the hemelytra of certain heteropterous insects. It resembles the rest of the corium in consistence, and is separated from it only by a thickened rib or vein.

embolize (em'bō-liz), v. t.; pret. and pp. embolized, ppr. embolizing. [< embolemus + -ize.] To cut off from the circulation by embolism.

Embolomeri (em-bō-lom'ē-ri), n. pl. [NL., pl. of embolomerus*: see embolomerous.] An order of extinct amphibians, having a set of vertebral centra interposed between the regular vertebral bodies, so that each vertebral arch has two centra, whence the name.

embolomerism (em-bō-lom'ē-rizm), n. [< embolomerous + -ism.] Formation of the vertebral column by means of intercentra between the centra; diplospondylism.

embolomerous (em-bō-lom'ē-rus), a. [*< NL. embolomerus, < Gr. ἐμβόλιος, thrown in, + μέρος, part.] Thrown in, as intercalated centra or intercentra, between arch-bearing bodies of the vertebrae of the spinal column; having intercentra, as a spinal column; diplospondylic.

The caudal region is embolomerous.

E. D. Cope, Geol. Mag., II, 527.

embolon, embolum (em'bō-lon, -lum), n.; pl. embola (-lā). [L. embolum, < Gr. ἐμβόλον, neut., ἐμβόλιος, masc., the bronze beak or ram of a

Embolon.—Ulysses and the Sirens, from Greek red-figured hydria found at Vulci. (From "Monumenti dell' Instituto.") ship: see embolemus.] 1. The beak of an ancient war-ship. It was made of metal, in various forms, and sharpened like the prow of a modern ram, so that it might pierce an enemy's vessel beneath the water-line.

2. Same as embolemus.

embolophasia (em'bō-lō-fā'zi-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐμβόλιος, thrown in, + φάσις, a saying, < φάμαι = L. fari, speak.] In rhet., the interjection into discourse of meaningless and usually more or less sonorous words.

embolum, n. See embolon.

embolus (em'bō-lus), n.; pl. emboli (-lī). [L., the piston of a pump, < Gr. ἐμβόλιος, masc., ἐμβόλιον, neut., anything pointed so as to thrust in easily, a peg, stopper, etc., prop. an adj., thrown or thrust in, or that may be thrown or thrust in, < ἐμβάλλειν, thrust in, throw in, < ἐν, in, + βάλλειν, throw.] 1. Something inserted into or acting within something else; that which thrusts or drives, as a piston or wedge.—2. The clot of fibrin obstructing a blood-vessel, causing embolism: as, capillary emboli.—3. The nucleus emboliformis of the cerebellum.

Also embolon, embolum.

emboly (em'bō-lī), n. [< Gr. ἐμβολή, insertion, < ἐμβάλλειν, throw in: see embolemus.] In embryol., that mode of invagination by which a vesicular morula or blastosphere becomes a gastrula. It may be illustrated by the process of tucking half of a hollow india-rubber ball into the other half, and is effected by the more or less complete inclusion of the hypoblastic blastomeres within the epiblastic blastomeres, with the result of the diminution or abolition of the original blastocoele, the formation of an archenteron or primitive alimentary cavity with an orifice of invagination or blastopore, and thus the formation of a two-layered germ whose double walls consist of a hypoblastic endoderm and an epiblastic ectoderm, which is therefore a gastrula.

embondager (em-bon'dāj), v. t. [< em-1 + bond- age.] To reduce to bondage; enslave.

If the devil might have his free option, I believe he would ask nothing else but liberty to enfranchise all false Religions, and to embondage the true.

N. Ward, Simple Cobler, p. 4.

embonpoint (on-bōn-pwañ'), n. [F., fullness, plumpness; orig. a phrase en bon point, in good condition: em, in; bon, good; point, point, degree, condition: see in-1, bonus, and point.] Exaggerated plumpness; rotundity of figure; stoutness: a euphemism for fatness or fleshiness.

A clearness of skin almost bloom, and a plumpness almost embonpoint, softened the decided lines of her features. Charlotte Brontë, The Professor, xviii.

The Queen [Victoria] was not very tall, but . . . until embonpoint overtook her, her figure was exquisitely beautiful. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII, 285.

emborder (em-bōr'dēr), v. t. [Formerly also imborder; < em-1 + border. Cf. OF. emborder, border, < en-1 + bord, border.] 1. To furnish, inclose, or adorn with a border.—2. To place as in a border; arrange as a border.

Thick-woven arbores and flowers Imborder'd on each bank. Milton, P. L., ix, 438.

embordered (em-bōr'dērd), p. a. [Formerly also imbordered (in heraldry also embordured); pp. of emborder, v.] Adorned with a border; specifically, in her., having a border: an epithet used only when the border is of the same tincture as the field.

embosom (em-būz'um), v. t. [Formerly also imbosom; < em-1 + bosom.] 1. To take into or hold in the bosom; hold in nearness or intimacy; admit to the heart or affections; cherish.

This graceless man, for furtherance of his guile, Did court the handmaid of my Lady deare, Who, glad t' embosome his affection vile, Did all she might more pleasing to appeare. Spenser, F. Q., II, iv, 25.

embosser (em-bos'er), n. One who or that which embosses; something used for producing raised figures or impressions.

The first form of Morse recorder was the Embosser.
Preece and Stewright, Telegraphy, p. 67.

embossing (em-bos'ing), n. [Verbal n. of emboss¹, v.] 1. The art or process of producing raised or projecting figures or designs in relief upon surfaces. A common method of embossing upon a wooden surface is by driving a blunt tool into the wood according to the desired pattern, then planing the surface down to the level of the sunken design, and afterward wetting it. The moisture causes the compressed portions forming the design to rise to their original height, and thus to project from the planed surface. Embossing on leather, paper, or cloth, as for book-covers, books for the blind, and various kinds of ornamental work, and also on metal, is usually effected by stamping with dies by means of an embossing- or stamping-press, or the bookbinders' arming-press. Embossing with the needle is done either by working over a pad made of cloth, sometimes in several thicknesses, or by stuffing with wool, hair, or the like, under the threads, as in couched work. See embossing-machine.

2. A raised figure or design; an embossment. [Rare.]

For so letters, if they be so farre off as they cannot be discerned, shew but as a dusky paper; and all engravings and embossings appear plain.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 878.

embossing-iron (em-bos'ing-ir'ern), n. A tool employed to produce a grained surface on marble.

embossing-machine (em-bos'ing-ma-shēn'), n. 1. A system of heated rolls, the faces of which are cut with an ornamental design, used to impress the design on figured velvets and other fabrics.—2. A machine for ornamenting wood-surfaces by pressing hot molds upon the wet wood and burning in the pattern, the charcoal being afterward removed. In some machines engraved rolls are used in place of stamps, and the wood is steamed and passed between the rolls while hot.

3. A machine for embossing an ornamental design on boot- and shoe-fronts.

embossing-press (em-bos'ing-pres), n. An apparatus for stamping and embossing paper, cardboard, book-covers, leather, etc., and for erasing checks by destroying the texture of the paper on which they are written.

embossment (em-bos'ment), n. [< emboss¹ + -ment.] 1. The act of embossing or forming protuberances or knobs upon a surface; the state of being embossed or studded.—2. A prominence like a boss; a knob or jutting point.

I wish, also, in the very middle, a fair mount, with three ascents and alleys, which I would have to be perfect circles, without any bulwarks or embossments.
Bacon, Gardens (ed. 1887).

3. Relief; raised work.

The gold embossment might indeed have been done by another, but not these heads, so true to the life, and of an art so far beyond any ability of mine, that I am tempted sometimes to think that he is in league with Vulcan.
W. Ware, Zenobia, I. 65.

The admission ticket for the City festival was a rich embossment from a specially cut die in the old French style of Louis XIV. First Year of a Silken Reign, p. 64, note.

embottle (em-bot'l'), v. t. [< em-1 + bottle².] To put in a bottle; confine in a bottle; bottle.

F. ébraser, splay), < en- + braser, skew, chamfer*.] 1. In arch., the enlargement of the aperture of a door or window on the inside of the wall, designed to give more room or admit more light, or to provide a wider range for ballistic arms.

Meanwhile apart, in the twilight gloom of a window's embrasure, Sat the lovers, and whispered together.
Longfellow, Evangeline, i. 3.

2. In fort., an opening in a wall or parapet through which guns are pointed and fired; the Section and Plan of Embrasure.

A, E, F, F', section of parapet; B, C, D, E, elevation of one cheek of embrasure; A, B, genouillère; B, E, slope of sole; X, Y, X', Y', directrices of embrasures; c, c', c'', throat, or interior opening; d, e, e', mouth, or exterior opening; x, y, x', c, d, e, c', d', e', cheeks or sides; b, b', b'', sole or bottom; c', c'', b', b'', e', e', merlon; b, b', sill. The widening of the embrasure toward the front is called the splay.

indent or crenelle of an embattlement. When the directrix (the line which bisects the sole) is perpendicular to the interior crest of the parapet, the embrasure is termed direct; when the directrix makes an acute angle with it, the embrasure is said to be oblique. The axis of an embrasure is that part of the directrix which lies within the boundaries of the sole. See battlement.

We saw . . . on the side of the Hill an old ruined parapet with four or five embrasures.
Cook, Third Voyage, vi. 5.

Say, pilot, what this fort may be,
Whose sentinels look down
From motteled walls that show the sea
Their deep embrasures' frown?
O. W. Holmes, Voyage of the Good Ship Union (1862).

embrasure² (em-brā'sūr), n. [Irreg. < embrace, F. embrasser, + -ure.] An embrace.

Where injury of chance Puts back leave-taking, . . . forcibly prevents Our lock'd embrasures.
Shak., T. and C., iv. 4.

embrave (em-brāv'), v. t. [Also imbrave; < em-1 + brave.] 1. To inspire with bravery; make bold.

Psyche, embrav'd by Charis' generous flame,
Strives in devotion's furnace to refine
Her pious soul.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, xvii, Arg.

Sage Moses first their wondrous might descry'd,
When, by some drops from hence imbraved,
His triumph sung o'er th' Erythraean Tide.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, i. 3.

The act of moistening and rubbing a bruised or injured part with some liquid substance.

Embrocation, a devise that physicians have to foment the head or any other part, with some liquor falling from aloft upon it, in manner of rain, whence it took its name.
Holland, tr. of Plutarch, Expl. of Obscure Words.

2. The liquid with which an affected part is rubbed; a fomentation; liniment.

To scour away the foule dandruffe, an embrocation of it [wild mint] and vinegre upon the head in the sun is counted singular.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xx. 14.

embrodert, v. t. An obsolete form of embroider.

embroglio (em-brō'lyō), n. [An erroneous form (imitating embroid) of embroglio.]

embroid (em-broid'), v. t. [< ME. embroyden, embrouden, embrowden, embrauden, embraiden, < OF. embroder, embroider, < en- + broder, border, broider (cf. ME. broyden, brouden, etc., partly var. of breiden, braiden, braid): see broid, broider, and border.] Same as embroider.

Embrouded was he, as it were a mede,
Al ful of freshe floures, white and rede.
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 89.

This woful lady ylernd had in youthe
So that she werken and embroiden couthe.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2352.

embroider (em-broi'dér), v. t. [Formerly also imbroider, embroder, imbroder; extended with -er, as in broider, q. v., after broidery, embroidery, from earlier embroid.] 1. To decorate with ornamental needlework. See embroidery.
His garment was disguised very vayne,
And his embroidered Bonet sat awry.
Spenser, F. Q., III. xii. 9.
Thou shalt embroider the coat of fine linen.
Ex. xxviii. 39.
Some imbrodered with white beads, some with copper, other painted after their manner.
Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I. 130.

2. To work with the needle upon a ground; produce or form in needlework, as a flower, a cipher, etc.: as, to embroider silver stars on velvet.
The whole Chappell covered on the outside with cloth of Tissue: the gift, as appareth by the arms imbrodered thereon, of the Florentine.
Sandys, Travels, p. 132.

3. Figuratively, to embellish; decorate with verbal or literary ornament; hence, to falsify or exaggerate: as, the story has been considerably embroidered.
None of his writings are so agreeable to us as his Letters, particularly those which are written with earnestness, and are not embroidered with verses.
Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

embroiderer (em-broi'dér-ér), n. One who embroiders, in any sense of the word.

Their embroiderers are very singular workmen, who work much in gold and silver.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 122.

I am ashamed thus to employ my pen in correcting this embroiderer, who has stuffed his writings with so many lies that those who bear him the least ill-will are forced to blush at his fopperies and toys.
North, Life of Qvoniambec.

embroidery (em-broi'dér-i), n.; pl. embroideries (-iz). [embroider, after broidery.] 1. The art of working with the needle raised and ornamental designs in threads of silk, cotton, gold, silver, or other material, upon any woven fabric, leather, paper, etc. Embroidery has been used in all ages for the decoration of hangings and garments used for statues of divinities or in religious ceremonies; but its use in ordinary dress was especially developed during the middle ages in Europe, when garments entirely ornamented with the needle were worn by those who could afford them, and heraldry offered an opportunity for embroidery upon the surcoats and tabards of men-at-arms. The nations of Persia and the extreme East are the greatest masters of embroidery in modern times. The example most familiar to the West is the India shawl, for which see cashmere and chudder.
2. A design produced or worked according to this art.

Next these a youthful train their vows express'd,
With feathers crown'd, with gay embroidery dress'd.
Pope, Temple of Fame.

They were cloaks of the richest material, covered with lace and embroidery; corked shoes, pantfoles, or slippers, ornamented to the utmost of their means; and this extravagance was anxiously followed by men of all classes.
Fairholt, I. 256.

3. Variegated or diversified ornamentation, especially by the contrasts of figures and colors; ornamental decoration.

As if she contended to have the embroidery of the earth richer than the cope of the sky. B. Jonson, The Penates.
If the natural embroidery of the meadows were helpt and improved by art, a man might make a pretty landscape of his own possessions.
Spectator, No. 414.

4. In her., a hill or mount with several copings or rises and falls.—Canadian, chain-stitch, chenille, cloth, cordovan embroidery. See the qualifying words.—Cut-cloth embroidery, a kind of embroidery in which pieces of cloth cut in the shape of leaves, flowers, etc., are sewed upon a foundation, the whole being assisted by decorative edging-lines and the like in needlework. See appliqué, and cloth appliqué, under cloth.—Danish embroidery. See Danish.—Darned embroidery, a kind of embroidery in which a background of a somewhat open textile fabric is filled in by the needle with new threads, so as to make a solid and opaque surface in the form of the design. This is especially used for washable materials, such as muslin for curtains.—Etching-embroidery. See etching.

embroidery-frame (em-broi'dér-i-frām), n. A frame on which material to be embroidered is fastened and stretched, so that it may not be drawn in the working.

embroidery-needle (em-broi'dér-i-nē'dl), n. Any one of various large needles or implements of like character used in ornamental needlework and similar processes. The chenille embroidery-needle has a large open eye and a sharp point; the worsted- or wool-work needle, for use with canvas, is usually blunt, and has the eye nearly as large as in the former. For embroidery on solid materials the needle is thin and sharp, and has a long narrow eye; for crochet- and tambour-work the so-called needle is in reality a hook.

embroidery-paste (em-broi'dér-i-pāst), n. An adhesive mixture used in embroidery to make materials adhere together, and also to stiffen the embroidery at the back. Dict. of Needlework.

embroid¹ (em-broi'), v. t. [em-1 + broil¹. Appar. confused with embroid².] To broil; burn.

Fleury diseases, seated in the spirit, embroile the whole frame of the body.
N. Ward, Simple Coblér, p. 7.

That knowledge for which we boldly attempt to rife God's cabinet should, like the coal from the altar, serve only to embroil and consume the sacrilegious invaders.
Decay of Christian Piety.

embroid² (em-broi'), v. t. [OF. embroillir, embroillir, embrouillir, become troubled, confused, or soiled, later and mod. F. embrouiller (= Sp. embrollar = Pg. embrolhar = It. imbrogliare), entangle, confuse, embroil, < en- + brouiller, confuse, jumble: see broil².] 1. To mix up or entangle; intermix confusedly; involve. [Rare in this literal use.]
Omitted paragraphs *embroid*d the sense,
With vain traditions stopp'd the gaping fence.
Dryden, Religio Laici, l. 266.

The Christian antiquities at Rome . . . are embroided with fable and legend.
Addison.
2. To involve in contention or trouble by discord; disturb; distract.

I had no design to embroil my kingdom in civil war.
Eikon Basilike.
It pleas'd God not to embroile and put to confusion his whole people for the perverseness of a few.
Milton, Eikonoklastes, xxvi.

I verily believe it is the sad inequality of intellect that prevails that embroils communities more than any thing else.
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 161.

embroid² (em-broi'), n. [embroid², v.] Perplexity; confusion; embarrassment. Shaftesbury.

What an embroil it had made in Parliament is not easy to conjecture.
Roger North, Examen, p. 568.

embroilment (em-broi'ment), n. [OF. (and F.) embrouillement (= Pg. embrouhamento = It. imbrogliamento, < embrouiller, embroil: see embroid² and ment.] The act of embroiling, or the state of being embroiled; a state of contention, perplexity, or confusion; disturbance; entanglement.

He [the Prince of Orange] was not apprehensive of a new embroilment, but rather wished it.
By. Burnet, Hist. Own Times, an. 1678.

As minister to England during the war he [Adams] had largely contributed by his firmness and discretion to save the country from a foreign embroilment.
G. S. Merriam, S. Bowles, II. 180.

embronze^t (em-bronz'), v. t. [em-1 + bronze.] To form or represent in bronze, as a statue.

Will you in largesses exhaust your store,
That you may proudly stalk the Circus o'er,
Or in the Capitol *embronze*d may stand,
Spoil'd of your fortune and paternal land?
Francis, tr. of Horace's Satires, ii.

embrothel^t (em-broth'el), v. t. [em-1 + brothel².] To inclose or harbor in a brothel. [Rare.]

Men which choose
Law practice for mere gain, boldly repute
Worse than embrothel'd strumpets prostitute.
Donne.

embroude^t, embrowde^t, v. t. Middle English variants of embroid.

embrown (em-broun'), v. [Formerly also imbrown; < em-1 + brown. Cf. OF. embrunir, darken, make brown or blackish, < em- + brun, brown.] 1. To make brown; darken.

Whence summer suns embrown the labouring awains.
Fenton, To Mr. Southern.

2. To make dark or obscure.

Where the unpierced shade
Imbrown'd the noontide bowers.
Milton, P. L., iv. 246.

II. intrans. To grow or become brown; acquire a brownish hue.

In the fields and woods, meanwhile, there were . . . signs and signals of the Summer: the darkening foliage; the embrowning grain.
Longfellow, Kavanagh, xviii.

embruer (em-brö'), v. t. An obsolete spelling of imbrue.

embrute (em-bröt'), v.; pret. and pp. embruted, ppr. embruting. [Formerly also imbrute; < em-1 + brute.] 1. trans. To degrade to the condition of a brute; make brutal or like a brute; brutalize.
All the man embruted in the swine.
Cawthorne, Regulation of the Passions.

Mix'd with bestial slime,
This essence to incarnate and imbrute,
That to the height of deity aspir'd!
Milton, P. L., ix. 166.

II. intrans. To fall or sink to the condition of a brute.

The soul grows clotted by contagion,
Imbodies, and imbrutes, till she quite lose
The divine property of her first being.
Milton, Comus, l. 468.

embryo (em'bri-ō), n. and a. [Formerly also embrio (also embryon, formerly also embrion); < F. embryon = Sp. embrion = Pg. embrião = It. embrione, < NL. embryon, erroneously taken, appar. at first by French writers, as embryo(n-), as if from a Gr. ἐμβρυόν*, but properly embryon (reg. L. embryum*), < Gr. ἐμβρυον (stem ἐμβρυ-), the embryo, fetus, also applied to a newly born animal, neut. of ἐμβρυος, growing in, < ἐν, in, + βρυω, swell, be full.] 1. n. 1. The fecundated germ of an animal in its earlier stages of development, and before it has assumed the distinctive form and structure of the Early Human Embryo, giving diagrammatically the principal vessels antecedent to the establishment of the regular fetal circulation.

H, heart; P, lungs; L, liver; T.A., the aortic trunk or cardiac aorta; c, c', c'', common, external, and internal carotids; s, subclavian artery; v, vertebral artery; 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, the aortic arches (the persistent left aortic arch hidden); A, subvertebral aorta; a, a', omphalomesenteric artery and vein, to and from U, the umbilical vesicle with its vitelline duct, dv; u, u', the two hypogastric or umbilical arteries, with the ramifications, u'', u''', in the placenta; u'', umbilical vein; vh, hepatic vein; cv, inferior vena cava; vp, iliac veins; az, an azygos vein; vp, a posterior cardinal vein; vi, innominate vein; sp, portal vein; dv, the ductus venosus; DC, a ductus Cuvieri. The anterior cardinal vein is seen beginning in the head and running down to the ductus Cuvieri, on the under side of the numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

parent; a germ; a rudiment; in a more extended sense, a rudimentary animal during its whole antenatal existence. In the later stages of development, especially in man and the mammals generally, the name fetus commonly takes the place of embryo. In the cases of oviparous animals, the term embryo properly covers the whole course of development of the fecundated germ in the egg (which see, and see cut under dorsal): as, the hen's egg contained an embryo ready to hatch. By a late and loose, though now common, extension of the term, it is applied to various larval stages of some invertebrates, which in the course of their transformation are frequently so different from the parent as to be described as distinct species or genera: as, the embryo (first larval stage) of a cestoid worm.

The embryos of a man, dog, seal, bat, reptile, etc., can at first hardly be distinguished from each other.
Darwin, Descent of Man, I. 31.

2. In bot., the rudimentary plant contained in the seed, the result of the action of pollen upon the ovule. It may be so rudimentary as to have apparently no distinction of parts; but even in its simplest form it consists virtually of a single internode of an axis, which upon germination develops at one extremity a leaf or leaves with a terminal bud, and a root at the other. In more developed embryos this initial internode or caulicle (often incorrectly called radicle) bears at one end one, two, or more rudimentary leaves called cotyledons, and often an initial bud or plumule. Also called germ. By recent authors the term is also applied to the developed oospore in vascular cryptogams. See cuts under albumen and cotyledon.

3. The beginning or first state of anything, while yet in a rude and undeveloped condition; the condition of anything which has been conceived but is not yet developed or executed; rudimentary state: chiefly in the phrase in embryo.

There were Items of such a Treaty being in Embrio.
Congreve, Way of the World, I. 9.

The company little suspected what a noble work I had then in embryo.
Swift.

A little bench of heedless bishops here,
And there a chancellor in embryo.
Shenstone, Schoolmistress.

Epispermic embryo. See epispermic. = Syn. Fetus, Germ, Rudiment. The first of these is mainly applied to the embryos of viviparous vertebrates in the later stages of their development, when they are more subject to observation. Germ means especially the seed or fecundated ovum, and scarcely extends beyond the early stages of an embryo. Rudiment is simply the specific application of a more general term to a germ or to the early, crude, or 'rude' stages of an embryo.

II. a. Being in the first or rudimentary stage of growth or development; incipient; embryonic: as, an embryo flower.

The embryo manor of the German tribesman, with its village of serfs upon it, might therefore, if the same practice prevailed, differ in three ways from the later manor. Seebohm, Eng. Vil. Community, p. 341.

Embryo buds, in bot., the hard nodules which occur in the bark of the beech, olive, and other trees, and are capable of developing leaves and shoots.

embryoctony (em-bri-ok'tō-ni), n. [< Gr. ἐμβρυον, an embryo, + -κτονία, < κτείνω, destroy.] In obstet., the destruction of the fetus in the uterus, as in cases of impossible delivery.

embryogenic (em'bri-ō-jen'ik), a. Pertaining to embryogeny.

embryogeny (em-bri-ōj-e-ni), n. [< Gr. ἐμβρυον, an embryo, + -γενεῖα, < -γενής, producing: see -geny.] The formation and development of the embryo; that department of science which treats of such formation and development.

Taxonomy ought to be the expression of ancestral development, or phylogeny, as well as of embryogeny and adult structure. Huxley, Encyc. Brit., II. 49.

embryogony (em-bri-ōg'ō-ni), n. [< Gr. ἐμβρυον, an embryo, + -γονία, generation, < -γονος, producing, generating: see -gony.] Same as embryogeny.

embryograph (em'bri-ō-gräf), n. [< Gr. ἐμβρυον, embryo, + γράφειν, write.] An instrument consisting of an ordinary microscope combined with a camera lucida for the purpose of accurately drawing the outlines of embryos and series of sections thereof. It is also used to reconstruct minute morphological and histological details on a large scale from series of microscopic sections. It was invented by Prof. His of Leipzig.

embryographic (em'bri-ō-gräf'ik), a. [< embryograph + -ic.] Drawn or graphically represented by means of the embryograph.

embryography (em-bri-ōg'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. ἐμβρυον, an embryo, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] That department of anatomy which describes the embryo or treats of its development.

embryologic, embryological (em'bri-ō-loj'ik, -i-kəl), a. Of or pertaining to embryology.

The homologies of any being, or group of beings, can be most surely made out by tracing their embryological development, when that is possible. Darwin, Fertil. of Orchids by Insects, p. 233.

embryologically (em'bri-ō-loj'i-kəl-i), adv. According to or as regards the laws or principles of embryology.

Is the hypoplaia a warbler embryologically, or is he a yellow finch, connected with serins and canaries, who has taken to singing? Kingsley, Life, II. 203.

embryologist (em-bri-ol'ō-jist), n. [< embryology + -ist.] One who studies embryos; one versed in the principles and facts or engaged in the study of embryology.

embryology (em-bri-ol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. ἐμβρυον, an embryo, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That department of science which relates to the development of embryos.

embryon (em'bri-on), n. and a. [Formerly also embryon; < F. embryon: see embryo.] I. n. 1. The earlier form of embryo.

Let him e'en die; we have enough beside, In embryon. B. Jonson, Alchemist, II. 1.

The reverence I owe to that one womb In which we both were embryons, makes me suffer What's past. Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, i. 2.

Give me leave: I have An embryon in my brain, which I despair not, May be brought to form and fashion. Massinger, Great Duke of Florence, III. 1.

I perceive in you the embryon of a mighty intellect which may one day enlighten thousands. Shelley, in Dowden, I. 230.

2. [cap.] [NL.] In entom., a genus of leaf-beetles, of the family Chrysomelidae, with one species, E. griseovillosum, of Brazil. Thomson, 1857.

II. a. Embryonic; rudimentary; crude; not fully developed. [Archaic.]

Embryon truths and verities yet in their chaos. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., II. 5.

For Hot, Cold, Moist, and Dry, four champions fierce, Strive here for mastery, and to battle bring Their embryon atoms. Milton, P. L., II. 900.

Even the beings of his creation lie before him [Shakespeare] in their embryon state. I. D. Israel, Amen. of Lit., II. 189.

embryonal (em'bri-on-əl), a. [< embryon + -al.] This and the following forms in embryon- are etymologically improper, being based on the erroneous (NL.) stem embryon- instead of the proper stem embryo-, embry-. Of or pertaining to an embryo, or to the embryonic stage of an organism.

* Embryonal masses of protoplasm. Bastian.

emotion (ē-mō'shon), n. [= F. émotion = Sp. emocio = Pg. emoção = It. emozione, < L. as if emotio* (n-), < emotus, pp. of emovere, move out, move away, remove, stir up, agitate: see emove.] 1. Excited or unusual motion; disturbed movement.

I think nothing need to be said to encourage it [bath-ing in cold water], provided this one caution be used, that he never go into the water, when exercise has at all warm'd him or left any emotion in his blood or pulse.
Locke, Education, § 8.

2. An agitated or aroused, and usually distinctly pleasurable or painful, state of mind directed toward some object; technically, a sensation excited by an idea and directed toward an object, and accompanied by some bodily commotion, such as blushing, trembling, weeping, or some slighter disturbance not manifest to a second party. Under violent emotion all the muscles of the body may be affected, but the most common effects are in the expression of the face—the mouth, eyes, and nose, named in the order of their expressiveness. The voice is also generally affected.

The stirrings of pride, vanity, covetousness, impurity, discontent, resentment, these succeed each other through the day in momentary emotions, and are known to Him.

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, i. 45.

It has been usual with psychologists to confound emotions with feeling, because intense feeling is essential to emotion. But, strictly speaking, a state of emotion is a complete state of mind, a psychosis, and not a psychical element, if we may so say. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 72.

Mellow, melancholy, yet not mournful, the tone seemed to gush up out of the deep well of Hepzibah's heart, all steeped in its profoundest emotion.

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, vi.

=Syn. 2. Trepidation, Tremor, etc. See agitation. emotional (ē-mō'shon-al), a. [< emotion + -al.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of emotion.

Whatever moral benefit can be effected by education must be effected by an education which is emotional rather than perceptive. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 384.

It is emotional force, not intellectual, that brings out exceptional results. L. F. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., II. 598.

2. Characterized by emotion; attended by or producing emotion; subject to emotion: as, an emotional poem; an emotional temperament.

Great intellect . . . is not readily united with a large emotional nature. A. Bain, Corr. of Forces, p. 236.

emotionalism (ē-mō'shon-al-izm), n. [< emotional + -ism.] 1. The character of being emotional, or of being subject to emotion; tendency to emotional excitement.

Churchism and Moralism place the essence of Christianity in action, and Emotionalism puts it in feeling.

J. F. Clarke, Orthodoxy, p. 31.

2. The practice of working upon the emotions; the disposition to substitute superficial emotion for deeper feeling or right purpose.—3. The expression of emotion.

emotionalist (ē-mō'shon-al-ist), n. [< emotional + -ist.] 1. One who is easily overcome by emotions; a person subject to or controlled by emotion.

The stiff materialist is not educated for a sound investigator any more than the limp emotionalist.

N. A. Rev., CXLI. 262.

2. One who endeavors to excite emotional feeling; one who appeals to the emotions rather than to the reason or conscience.

emotionality (ē-mō'shon-al-i-ti), n. [< emotional + -ity.] The quality of being emotional or of expressing emotion; emotionalism.

English which has once been in Italian acquires an emotionality which it does not perhaps wholly lose in returning to it. The Century, XXX. 206.

The dog . . . does not possess our faculty of imitation, our facial emotionality.

Allen and Neurol. (trans.), VII. 165.

emotional (ē-mō'shon-d), a. [< emotion + -ed.] Affected by emotion. [Rare.]

As the young chief th' affecting scene surveys,
How all his form th' emotional soul betrays!

Scott, Essay on Painting.

emotive (ē-mō'tiv), a. [< L. emotus, pp. of emovere, move (see emotion), + -ive.] Producing or marked by or manifesting emotion; of an emotional character.

To him display the wonders of their frame,
His own contemner, where eternal art,
Emotive, pants within the alternate heart.

Brooke, Universal Beauty, iv.

Minds of deep emotive sensibility are apt to feel pained, even exasperated, by scientific explanations which decline the imaginary aid of some incomprehensible outlying agency not expressible in terms of experience.

G. H. Leves, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. ii. § 1.

emotively (ē-mō'tiv-ly), adv. In an emotive manner. George Eliot.

emotiveness (ē-mō'tiv-nes), n. The state or quality of being emotive. [Rare.]

George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xl.

emotivity (ē-mō'tiv-i-ti), n. [< emotive + -ity.] The capacity or state of being emotive; emotionality. [Rare.]

Sensitivity and emotivity have also been used as the scientific terms for the capacity of feeling.

Hickok, Mental Science, p. 176

emove (ē-mōv'), v. t. [Less correctly emmove; < L. emovere, move out, move away, move, agitate, etc., < e, out, + movere, move: see move.] To move; arouse to emotion.

One day, when him high courage did emmove,
As wont ye knights to seek adventures wilde,
He pricked forth his puissant force to prove.

Spenser, F. Q., II. i. 50.

While with kind nature, here amid the grove,
We pass'd this harmless sabbath of our time,
What to disturb it could, fell men, emove
Your barbarous hearts?

Thomson, Castle of Indolence.

empæstic, empestic (em-pes'tik), a. [Also, less prop., empaestic; < Gr. ἐμπαεστικός, sc. τέχνη, the art of embossing, < ἐμπαεστός, struck in, embossed, < ἐμπαεῖν, strike in, stamp, emboss, < ἐν, in, + παεῖν, strike. Cf. anapest.] Stamped, embossed, or inlaid, as work in metal.

emperor (em'pēr-ör), n. [Early mod. E. emperour; < ME. emperour, emperur, emparour, emperere, < OF. empereur, F. empereur = Pr. emperador = Sp. Pg. emperador = It. imperatore, < L. imperator, imperator, OL. induperator, a military commander-in-chief, ruler, emperor, < imperare, imperare, command: see empire.] 1.

1. A commander-in-chief; a supreme leader of an army or of armies.

To Agamyon that giften the gouernance hole,
for worthiest of wit that worship to haue;
And ordant hym Emperour by opyn assent,
With power full playn the pepul to lede.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 3670.

2. The sovereign or supreme ruler of an empire: a title of dignity conventionally superior to that of king: as, the emperor of Germany or of Russia. See empire. The title emperor, first assumed (with consent of the senate) by Julius Caesar, was held by the succeeding rulers of the Roman, and afterward of the Western and Eastern empires. The line of emperors of the West terminated in A. D. 476, but the title was revived in 800 by Charlemagne, who thus laid the foundation of the elective Holy Roman Empire (which see, under empire). The last of his successors had, before his abdication in 1806, adopted the title of hereditary emperor of Austria. The king of Prussia was crowned emperor of Germany in 1871. Peter the Great of Russia assumed the title in 1721, and the ruler of Brazil in 1822; and it was held by Napoleon I. and Napoleon III. of France. In 1876 Queen Victoria of England was proclaimed empress of India. In western speech the sovereigns of Turkey, China, Japan, etc., are called emperors.

Under existing international arrangements the crowned heads of Europe take precedence according to the date of their accession, and their rank is precisely the same, whether their style is imperial or royal. But the proper meaning of emperor is the chief of a confederation of states of which kings are members.

Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 417.

3. In zool.: (a) In entom.: (1) One of several large sphinxes or moths: as, the peacock emperor, Saturnia pavonia. (2) One of several large butterflies of the family Nymphalidae: as, the purple emperor, the popular name in Great Britain of Apatura iris, also called the purple emphasis (em-fā-sis), n. [= F. emphase (> D. G. emphase = Dan. enfase = Sw. emfas) = Sp. enfasis = Pg. emphasis = It. enfasi, emphasis, < L. emphasis (in pure L. significatio (n.); see signification), < Gr. ἐμφασις, an appearing in, outward appearance, a showing or letting a thing be seen as in a mirror (reflection, image), or as involved, hence, in rhet., pregnant suggestion, indirect indication, significance, emphasis, < ἐμφαίνω, show forth, < ἐν, in, + φαίνω, show, mid. φαίνεσθαι, appear, > φάσις, phase, appearance: see phase.] 1. In rhet.: (a) Originally, a figure consisting in a significant, pregnant, or suggestive mode of expression, implying (especially in connection with the context or the circumstances under which an oration is delivered) more than would necessarily or ordinarily be meant by the words used. This figure is of two kinds, according as it suggests either something more than is said, or something purposely not mentioned or professedly not intended. Poets frequently employ it for the former purpose, especially in similes and epithets. (b) The mode of delivery appropriate to pregnant or suggestive expression; hence, rhetorical stress; in general, significant stress; special stress or force of voice given to the utterance of a word, succession of words, or part of a word, in order to excite special attention. Emphasis on a syllable differs from syllabic accent by being exceptional in use, and altering the ordinary pronunciation of the word, either by increasing the stress on the syllable regularly accented or by transferring the accent to another syllable: as, a sin may be a sin of omission or a sin of commission (instead of omission, commission).

The province of emphasis is so much more important than that of accent that the customary seat of the latter is transferred in any case where the claims of emphasis require it. E. Porter, Rhetorical Delivery, iv.

2. Special and significant vigor or force: as, emphasis of gestulation; in general, significance; distinctiveness.

External objects stand before us . . . in all the life and emphasis of extension, figure and colour.

Str W. Hamilton.

=Syn. 1. Emphasis, Accent, Stress. Emphasis is generally upon a word, but may be upon a combination of words or a single syllable. Accent is upon a syllable: as, the place of the accent in the word "demonstrate" is not fixed. Stress is a synonym for either emphasis or accent. See inflection.

That voice all modes of passion can express
Which marks the proper word with proper stress;
But none emphatic can that speaker call
Who lays an equal emphasis on all.

Lloyd.

By increasing, therefore, the degree of habitual accent on a given syllable, we can render emphatic the word in which it occurs. G. L. Raymond, Orator's Manual, § 27.

emphasize (em-fā-siz'), v. t.; pret. and pp. emphasized, ppr. emphasizing. [Emphas (is) + -ize.] 1. To utter or pronounce with emphasis; render emphatic; lay stress upon: as, to emphasize a syllable, word, or declaration; to emphasize a passage in reading.—2. To bring out clearly or distinctly; make more obvious or more positive; give a stronger perception of.

In winter [the sea] is warmer, in summer it is cooler, than the ambient air, and the difference is emphasized the farther we get away from the shore.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVI. 335.

Unequal powers have made unequal opportunities first, however much the unequal opportunities afterwards may react on and emphasize the situation.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLII. 192.

emphatic (em-fat'ik), a. [= F. emphatique = Sp. enfático = Pg. emphatico = It. enfatico (cf. G. emphatisch = Dan. Sw. enfattisk), < Gr. ἐμφατικός, (< ἐμφασις, stem εμφα-*), equiv. form of ἐμφαντικός, expressive, vivid, forcible, < ἐμφαίνω (εμφαν-), show, declare: see emphasis.] 1. Uttered, or to be uttered, with emphasis or stress of voice: as, the emphatic words in a sentence.—2. Forcibly significant; expressive; impressive: as, an emphatic gesture.

When I wish to group our three homes and their names in an emphatic way, it certainly answers my purpose better to speak of Angelin as Old England than to speak of England as New Angeln. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 23.

His [Fox's] acceptance of office . . . would . . . have been the most emphatic demonstration of the union of all parties against the invaders. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xiv.

=Syn. Expressive, earnest, energetic, striking.

emphatical (em-fat'i-kal), a. 1. Same as emphatic. [Obsolete or rare.]—2. Apparent; obvious.

It is commonly granted that emphatical colours are light itself, modified by refractions. Boyle, Colours.

emphatically (em-fat'i-kal-i), adv. 1. With emphasis or stress of voice.—2. Significantly; forcibly; in a striking or impressive manner.—3. Conspicuously; preëminently.

The condition of the envious man is the most emphatically miserable. Steele, Spectator, No. 19.

He was emphatically a popular writer. Macaulay.

The doctrine that religion could be destined to pass through successive phases of development was pronounced to be emphatically unchristian. Lecky, Rationalism, I. 199.

4. According to appearance; according to impression produced.

What is delivered of their [dolphins'] incurvy must be taken emphatically: that is, not really, but in appearance. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 2.

emphaticalness (em-fat'i-kal-nes), n. The quality of being emphatic. [Rare.]

emphysis (em-fi-sis), n.; pl. emphyses (-sēs). [NL., < Gr. ἐν, in, on, + φύσις, an eruption, < φύω, break out, boil over.] In med., a vesicular tumor or eruption.

emphotion (em-fō'ti-on), n.; pl. emphotia (-ā). [MGr. ἐμφότιον (also ἐμφότειος ἱσθίς), lit. a garment of light, < ἐν, in, + φῶς (φωτ-), light.] In the Gr. Ch., the white robe put on immediately after baptism; the chrisom.

emphractic (em-frak'tik), a. and n. [Gr. ἐμφρακτικός, likely to obstruct, < ἐμφράσσειν, obstruct, block up, < ἐν, in, + φράσσειν, fence in, block, stop.] 1. a. In med., having the property of closing the pores of the skin.

II. n. A substance which when applied to the skin has the property of closing the pores.

emphrensy (em-fren'zi), v. t. [em-1 + phrensy, obs. form of frenzy.] To make frenzied; madden.

Is it a ravenous beast, a covetous oppressor? his tooth like a mad dog's envenomes and emphrenses.

Ep. Hall, St. Paul's Combat.

emphyema (em-fi'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐν, in, + φύμα, a tumor, a growth, < φύεσθαι, grow.] A tumor.

emphysem (em-fi-sem), n. The English form of emphysema. [Rare.]

emphysema (em-fi-sē'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐμφύσημα, an inflation (of the stomach, peritoneum, etc.), < ἐμφυσάω, blow in, inflate, < ἐν, in, + φυσάω, blow.] In pathol., distention with air or other gases.—Interstitial emphysema, the presence of air or other gases in the interstices of the tissues.—Vesicular emphysema, the permanent dilatation of the alveolar passages and infundibula of the lungs, the air-cells becoming obliterated. Also called alveolar ectasia.

emphysematous, emphysematose (em-fi-sem'a-tus, -tōs), a. [emphysema (t-) + -ous, -ose.] 1. Pertaining to, characterized by, or of the nature of emphysema; distended; bloated.—2. In bot., bladder; resembling a bladder.

emphyteusis (em-fi-tū'sis), n. [LL. (in Roman civil law), < Gr. ἐμψυτεύειν (only in Roman use), lit. an implanting, < ἐμψυτεύω, implant, ingraft, < ἐμψύω, implanted, ingrafted, inborn, innate (> ult. E. imp, q. v.), < ἐμψέω, implant, pass. grow in, < ἐν, in, + ψέω, produce, pass. grow.] In Rom. law, a contract by which houses or lands were given forever or for a long term on condition of their being improved and a stipulated annual rent paid to the grantor. It was usually for a perpetual term, thus corresponding to the feudal fee.

We are told that with the municipalities began the practice of letting out agri vectigales, that is, of leasing land for a perpetuity to a free tenant, at a fixed rent, and under certain conditions. The plan was afterwards extensively imitated by individual proprietors, and the tenant, whose relation to the owner had originally been determined by his contract, was subsequently recognised by the Prætor as having himself a qualified proprietorship, which in time became known as Emphyteusis.

Maine, Ancient Law, p. 299.

emphyteuta (em-fi-tū'tā), n. [LL., < Gr. ἐμψυτεύτης, a tenant by emphyteusis: see emphyteusis.] In Rom. law, a tenant by emphyteusis. emphyteutic (em-fi-tū'tik), a. [LL. emphyteuticus, < emphyteuta, q. v.] Pertaining to emphyteusis; held on the form of tenure known as emphyteusis; taken on hire, for which rent is to be paid: as, emphyteutic lands.

We have distinct proof that what is called in Roman law emphyteutic tenure was in use among the Greeks in the case of sacred land. C. T. Newton, Art and Archaeol., p. 145.

Emphyteutic lease. Same as baul à longues années (which see, under baul).

emphyteuticary (em-fi-tū'ti-kā-ri), n.; pl. emphyteuticaries (-riz). [LL. emphyteuticarius, < emphyteuticus: see emphyteutic.] In Rom. law, one who held lands by emphyteusis; an emphyteuta.

Emphytus (em-fi-tus), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐμψυτος, ingrafted, inserted; see emphyteusis, and imp, v.] A genus of hymenopterous insects, of the family Tenthredinidae, founded by Klug in 1881, having short wings with 2 marginal and 3 submarginal cells, filiform 9-jointed antennæ, Strawberry False-worm (Emphytus maculatus).

1, 2, pupa, ventral and lateral views (line shows natural size); 3, fly, enlarged (wings on one side detached); 4, larva; 5, fly with wings closed; 6, larva curled up; 7, cocoon; 8, antenna; 9, egg. (4, 5, 6, and 7 natural size; 8 and 9 enlarged.)

transverse head, prominent eyes, and a long abdomen, cylindrical in the male, and broad and carinate in the female. The larvæ have 22 legs, and are leaf-feeders. The male of E. maculatus is black, the female honey-yellow; its larvæ feeds on the strawberry, and is known in the United States and Canada as the strawberry false-worm.

Empidæ (em-pi-dē), n. pl. [NL., contr. of Empididae, < Empis (Empid), the typical genus: see Empis.] A family of tetrachætoous brachycerous flies, of the order Diptera, containing upward of 1,000 species, mostly of small size, inhabiting temperate and cold countries. They are characterized by a globose head with contiguous eyes, a simple third antenna-joint, and lengthened tarsal cells of the wings. They are very active and voracious, and in general resemble the Asilidæ. Species of this family may be seen dancing in swarms over running water in spring-time. The slender larvæ live in garden-mold. Also Empididæ and Empides.

Empididæ (em-pi-dī-dē), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Empidæ.

Empidonax (em-pi-dō'naks), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1855), < Gr. ἐμπίς (em-pi), a mosquito, gnat (see Empis), + ἄναξ, king.] A large genus of small American olivaceous flycatchers, of the family Tyrannidae, inhabiting North, Central, and South America, having the bill and feet moderate in length among allied genera, of mean length among related flycatchers, the tail emarginate, and the Traill's Flycatcher (Empidonax traillii).

plumage mostly dull-greenish. Four species are very common woodland migratory insectivorous birds of the eastern United States; the Acadian flycatcher, E. acadicus; Traill's, E. traillii; the least, E. minimus; and the yellow-bellied, E. flaviventris.

empiercet (em-pēr's'), v. t. [em-1 + pierce.] See impierce.

He stroke so hugely with his borrow'd blade,
That it empiercet the Pagans burghane.

Spenser, F. Q., II. viii. 45.

empight (em-pīt'), a. [em-1 + pight.] Fixed; Three bodies in one wast empight.

Spenser, F. Q., V. x. 8.

empire (em'pir), n. [ME. empire, empyre, empe (also empire, emperje: see empery), < OF. empire (also empirie), F. empire = Pr. emperi, emperi = *Sp. Pg. Westward the courſe of Empire takes its way.

Bp. Berkeley, Arts and Learning in America.

If we do our duties as honeſtly and as much in the fear of God as our forefathers did, we need not trouble ourſelves much about other titles to empire.

Lovell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 244.

2. The country, region, or union of ſtates or territories under the juuriſdiction and dominion of an emperor or other powerful ſovereign or government; uſually, a territory of greater extent than a kingdom, which may be, and often is, of ſmall extent: as, the Roman or the Ruſſian empire. The designation empire has been aſſumed in modern times by ſome ſmall or homogeneous monarchies, generally ephemeral; but properly an empire is an aggregate of conquered, colonized, or confederated ſtates, each with its own government ſubordinate or tributary to that of the empire as a whole. Such were and are all the great hiſtorical empires; and in this ſenſe the name is applied appropriately to any large aggregation of ſeparate territories under one monarch, whatever his title may be: as, the Aſſyrian, Babylonian, and Perſian empires; the empire of Alexander the Great; the British empire, etc. See emperor, and Holy Roman Empire, below.

3. Supreme control; governing influence; rule; ſway: as, the empire of reaſon or of truth.

We diſdain
To do thoſe ſervile offices, oft times
His fooliſh pride and empire will exact.

B. Jonſon, Magnetick Lady, iii. 4.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 690.

It is to the very end of our days a ſtruggle between our reaſon and our temper, which ſhall have the empire over us.

Steele, Tatler, No. 172.

Circle of the empire. See circle.—Eastern Empire, or Empire of the East, originally, that diſtinction of the Roman empire which had its ſeat in Conſtantinople. Its final ſeparation from the Western Empire dates from the death of Theodoſius the Great (A. D. 395), whoſe ſons Arcadius and Honorius received reſpectively the eaſtern and weſtern diſtinct divisions of the Roman dominion. After the fall of the Weſtern Empire, the Empire of the Eaſt is commonly known as the Byzantine Empire. It continued until the capture of Conſtantinople by the Turks in 1453.—Empire City, the city of New York: ſo called as being the chief city of the Empire State, and the commercial metropolis of the United States.—Empire State, the State of New York: ſo called from its ſuperior population and wealth as compared with the other States of the Union.—Holy Roman Empire, the German-Roman empire in weſtern and central Europe (in later times commonly ſtyled the German Empire), which, after a laſſe of more than three hundred years, reunited a large portion of the territories formerly belonging to the Weſtern Empire. The union of the German royal and Roman imperial crowns began with Charles the Great or Charleſmagne, king of the Franks, who was crowned emperor by the Pope at Rome A. D. 800; but the line of German kings who were at the ſame time Holy Roman emperors begins properly with Otto the Great, crowned emperor in 962. The empire was regarded as the temporal form of a theoretically univerſal dominion, whoſe ſpiritual head was the Pope, and the earlier emperors were crowned at Rome by the Pope. In the 12th century the Empire continued under monarchs of the Saxon, Franconian, and Hohenſtaufen dynaſties, paſſing in 1273 to the Auſtrian houſe of Hapsburg, the members of which line remained in uninterrupted poſſeſſion of the empire from 1438 until its final extinction in 1806. It had long previously loſt the greater part of the external territories which had entitled it to be called Roman; and its final diſſolution was due to the conqueſts and encroachments of Napoleon I. (See emperor.) The emperors were elected by certain of the more powerful German princes called electors, whoſe number was definitely fixed at ſeven by the Golden Bull of 1356, and remained at that number with but ſlight changes.—The Celeſtial Empire. See celestial.—Western Empire, the diſtinctive designation of the weſtern portion of the Roman world after its diſtinction into two independent empires in A. D. 395. (See Eastern Empire, above.) Its power very rapidly declined under the inroads of barbarians and other adverſe influences, and it was finally extinguiſhed in A. D. 476. = Syn. 1. Sway, dominion, rule, reign, government, ſupremacy.

empirema (em-pi-rē'mā), n.; pl. empiremata (-mā'tā). [NL., < Gr. as if ἐμπειρία*, < ἐμπειρ, be experienced in, < ἐμπειρος, experienced: see empiric.] In logic, a propoſition grounded upon experience. Alſo ſpelled empirema.

empireship (em-pi-riship), n. The power, ſovereignty, or dominion of an empire.

England has ſeized the empireship of India.
Library Mag., July, 1886.

empiric (em-pir'ik), a. and n. [Formerly empirick; < OF. empirique, F. empirique = Sp. empirico = Pg. It. empirico (cf. D. G. empirisch = Dan. Sw. empirisk), < L. empiricus, < Gr. ἐμπειρικός, experienced (ol' ἐμπειρικοί, the Empirics: see II. 1), < ἐμπειρία, experience, mere experience or practice without knowledge, esp. in medicine, empiricism, < ἐμπειρος, experienced or practised in, < ἐν, in, + πείρα, a trial, experiment, attempt; akin to πόρος, a way, < περ*, παρ* = E. fare, go.] I. a. 1. Same as empirical.—2. Versed in physical experimentation: as, an empiric alchemist.—3. Of or pertaining to the medical empirics.

It is accounted an error to commit a natural body to empiric physicians. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 17.

II. n. 1. [cap.] One of an ancient sect of Greek physicians who maintained that practice or experience, and not theory, is the foundation of the science of medicine.

Among the Greek physicians, those who founded their practice on experience called themselves empirics; those who relied on theory, methodists; and those who held a middle course, dogmatists.

Fleming, Vocab. of Philos. (ed. Krauth), p. 157.

2. An experimenter in medical practice, destitute of adequate knowledge; an irregular or unscientific physician; more distinctively, a quack or charlatan.

It is not safe for the Church of Christ when bishops learn what belongeth unto government, as empirics learn physic, by killing of the sick. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 24.

This is the cause why empirics and old women are more happy many times in their cures than learned physicians, because they are more religious in holding their medicines. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 198.

There are many empirics in the world who pretend to infallible methods of curing all patients.

Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. viii.

Empiricks and mountebanks.
Shaftebury, Advice to an Author, ii. § 2.

3. In general, one who depends mainly upon experience or intuition; one whose procedure in any field of action or inquiry is too exclusively empirical.

The empiric, . . . instead of ascending from sense to intellect (the natural progress of all true learning), . . . hurries, on the contrary, into the midst of sense, where he wanders at random without any end, and is lost in a labyrinth of infinite particulars. Harris, Hermes, iv.

Vague generalisations may form the stock-in-trade of the political empiric, but he is an empiric notwithstanding. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 91.

= Syn. 2. Mountebank, etc. See quack, n.

empirical (em-pir'i-kāl), a. [< empiric + -al.] 1. Pertaining to or derived from experience or experiments; depending upon or derived from the observation of phenomena.

In philosophical language the term empirical means simply what belongs to or is the product of experience or observation. Sir W. Hamilton.

Now here again we may observe the error into which Locke was led by confounding the cause of our ideas with their occasion. There can be no idea, he argues, prior to experience; granted. Therefore he concludes the mind previous to it is, as it were, a tabula rasa, owing every notion which it gains primarily to an empirical source. J. D. Morell.

The empirical generalization that guides the farmer in his rotation of crops serves to bring his actions into concord with certain of the actions going on in plants and soil. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 23.

2. Derived, as a general proposition, from a narrow range of observation, without any warrant for its exactitude or for its wider validity.

The empirical diagram only represents the relative number and position of the parts, just as a careful observation shows them in the flower; but if the diagram also indicates the places where members are suppressed, . . . I call it a theoretical diagram. Sachs, Botany (trans.), p. 525.

It is not at all impossible that Henry II. may have been among the pupils of Venice: certainly he was more of a lawyer than mere empirical education could make him. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 303.

3. Pertaining to the medical practice of an empiric, in either of the medical senses of that word; hence, charlatanical; quackish.

The empirical treatment he submitted to . . . hastened his end. Goldsmith, Bolingbroke.

Empirical certainty, cognition, ego, idealism, etc. See the nouns.—Empirical formula or law, a formula which sufficiently satisfies certain observations, but which is not supported by any established theory or probable hypothesis, so that it cannot be relied upon far beyond the conditions of the observations upon which it rests. Thus, the formula of Dulong and Petit expressing the relation between the temperature of a body and its radiative power cannot be extended to the calculation of the heat of the sun, since there is no reason for supposing that it would approximate to the truth so far beyond the temperatures at which the experiments were made.

empirically (em-pir'i-kāl-i), adv. In an empirical manner; by experiment; according to experience; without science; in the manner of quacks.

Every science begins by accumulating observations, and presently generalizes these empirically. H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 22.

empiricism (em-pir'i-sizm), n. [< empiric + -ism. See empiric.] 1. The character of being empirical; reliance on direct experience and observation rather than on theory; empirical method; especially, an undue reliance upon mere individual experience.

He [Radcliffe] knew, it is true, that experience, the safest guide after the mind is prepared for her instructions by previous institution, is apt, without such preparation, to degenerate to a vulgar and presumptuous empiricism. V. Knox, Essays, xxxviii.

At present, he [Bacon] reflected, some were content to rest in empiricism and isolated facts; others ascended too hastily to first principles. E. A. Abbott, Bacon, p. 344.

What is called empiricism is the application of superficial truths, recognized in a loose, unsystematic way, to immediate and special needs.

L. F. Ward, Dynam. Sociol., II. 203.

2. In med., the practice of empirics; hence, quackery; the pretension of an ignorant person to medical skill.

Shudder to destroy life, either by the naked knife or by the surer and safer medium of empiricism. Dwight.

3. The metaphysical theory that all ideas are derived from sensuous experience—that is, that there are no innate or a priori conceptions.

The terms Empiricism, Empiricist, Empirical, although commonly employed by metaphysicians with contempt to mark a mode of investigation which admits no higher source than experience (by them often unwarrantably restricted to Sensation), may be accepted without demur, since even the flavor of contempt only serves to emphasize the distinction.

G. H. Leves, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. ii. § 14.

empiricist (em-pir'i-sist), n. [< empiric + -ist.] 1. One who believes in philosophical empiricism; one who regards sensuous experience as the sole source of all ideas and knowledge.

Berkeley, as a consistent empiricist, saw that Sensation shuts itself up within its own home, and does not include its object. The object must be supplied from without, and he supplied it provisionally by the name of God. N. A. Rev., CXX. 409.

The empiricist can take no cognizance of anything that transcends experience. New Princeton Rev., II. 169.

2. A medical empiric.
empiricitic, empiricutic (em-pi-rik'tik, em-pir-i-kū'tik), a. [< empiric + -itic.] An unmeaning extension of empiric. Empirical.

The most sovereign prescription in Galen is but empiricutic. Shak., Cor., ii. 1.

empirism (em-pi-rizm), n. [= F. empirisme = Sp. Pg. It. empirismo = D. Dan. empirisme = Sw. empirism, < NL. empirismus*, < Gr. ἐμπειρισμός, experienced: see empiric.] Empiricism. [Rare.]

It is to this sense [second muscular], mainly, that we owe the conception of force, the origin of which empirism could never otherwise explain.

G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 219.

empiristic (em-pi-ris'tik), a. Of or pertaining to empiricism or to the empiricists; empirical. [Rare.]

The empiristic view which Helmholtz defends is that the space-determinations we perceive are in every case products of a process of unconscious inference. W. James, Mind, XII. 545.

Empis (em'pis), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1767), < Gr. ἐμπίς (ἐμπίς), a mosquito, gnat, larva of the gadfly; cf. Apis.] The typical genus of the family Empidæ.

emplace (em-plās'), v. t.; pret. and pp. em-placed, ppr. emplacing. [< OF. emplacier, place, employ, < en + placer, place: see place.] To place; locate. [Rare.]

They [Iranic buildings] were emplaced on terraces formed of vast blocks of hewn stone, and were approached by staircases of striking and unusual design.

G. Rawlinson, Origin of Nations, i. 101.

emplacement (em-plās'ment), n. [< F. emplacement, < OF. emplacier, place: see emplace.] 1. A placing or fixing in place; location. [Rare.]

But till recently it was impossible to give to Uz any more definite emplacement.

G. Rawlinson, Origin of Nations, ii. 241.

2. Place or site. Specifically, in fort.: (a) The space within a fortification allotted for the position and service of a gun or battery.

The emplacements should be connected with each other and with the barracks by screened roads.

Nature, XXXVI. 36.

(b) The platform or bed prepared for a gun and its carriage.
emplaster (em-plās'tēr), n. [< ME. emplastre, < OF. emplastre, F. emplâtre = Pr. emplastre = Sp. emplasto = Pg. emplastro = It. empiastro, impiastro, < L. emplastrum, a plaster, also, in horticulture, the band of bark which surrounds the eye in grafting, the scutcheon, < Gr. ἐμπλάστρον (also ἐμπλάστρος) and ἐμπλάστον, with or without φάρμακον, a plaster or salve, neut. of ἐμπλάστος, daubed on or over, < ἐμπλάσσειν, plaster up, stuff in, < ἐν, in, + πλάσσειν, form, mold. Abbr. plaster, q. v.] A plaster.

The spirits are so lately moved both from vapours and passions, . . . and the parts by bathes, unguents, or emplasters. Bacon, On Learning, iv. 2.

All emplasters applied to the breasts ought to have a hole for the nipples. Wise man, Surgery.

emplaster (em-plás'tér), v. t. [ME. emplastrer, OF. emplastrer, F. emplâtrer = Pr. emplastrar = Sp. emplastrar = Pg. emplastrar = It. empiastare, impiastare, < L. emplastrare, graft, bud, ML. plaster. Cf. Gr. ἐμπλαστῆρ, put on a plaster, < ἐμπλαστρον, a plaster: see emplaster, n. Abbr. plaster, q. v.] 1. To cover with or as with a plaster; gloss over; palliate.

Parde, als fair as ye his name emplastre,
He [Solomon] was a leechour and an ydolastre.
Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 1053.

2. To graft or bud.

The tree that shall emplastered be therby,
Take of the gemme, and bark, and therto bynde
This gemme unhurt.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 161.

emplastic (em-plás'tik), a. and n. [Gr. ἐμπλαστικός, stopping the pores, clogging, < ἐμπλάσσειν, plaster up, stop up, stuff in, etc.: see emplaster, n.] 1. a. Viscous; glutinous; adhesive; fit to be applied as a plaster: as, emplastic applications.

II. n. A constipating medicine.

emplastration, n. The act of budding or grafting.

Solempnythe hath emplastracion, Wherof before is taught the diligence.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 165.

empleadit, v. t. See implead.

emplectite (em-plek'tit), n. [Gr. ἐμπλεκτός, inwoven (see empletum), < -ιτεῖν.] A sulphid of bismuth and copper, occurring in prismatic crystals of a grayish or tin-white color and bright metallic luster.

empletum, empletion (em-plek'tum, -ton), n. [L. < Gr. ἐμπλεκτον, rubble-work, neut. of ἐμπλέκω, inwoven, < ἐμπλέκειν, inweave, entwine, entangle, < ἐν, in, < πλέκειν, weave.] In arch., either of two kinds of masonry in use among the Greeks and Romans, and other peoples. (a) That kind of solid masonry in regular courses in which the courses are formed alternately entirely of blocks presenting one of their sides to the exterior and entirely of blocks presenting their ends to the exterior.

Sometimes the [Etruscan] wall is built in alternate courses, in the style which has been called empletion, the ends of the stones being exposed in one course, and the sides in the other. G. Rawlinson, Orig. of Nations, i. 114.

(b) That kind of masonry, much used in ancient fortification-walls, etc., in which the outside surfaces on both sides are formed of ashlar laid in regular courses, and the inclosed space between them is filled in with rubble-work, cross-stones being usually placed at intervals, either in courses or as ties extending from face to face of the wall, and binding the whole together. The term is, however, a loose one, and can be applied to any sort of masonry of greater thickness than the width of a single block, and so laid that the wall is bound together by some regular alternation of blocks placed lengthwise and endwise. Sometimes erroneously written empletion.

emplete, v. t. See implead.

emplet, v. t. A Middle English variant of imple.

empletor (em-plér'), v. t. An obsolete form of emplet.

employ (em-ploi'), v. t. [Formerly also employ; < OF. employer, emploier (early emplier*: see emplet, imply), F. employer = Pr. empletar = Sp. emplear = Pg. empegar = It. impiegare, < L. implicare, infold, involve, engage, < in, in, < plicare, fold: see plicate, and cf. implicate and imply.] 1. To inclose; infold.—2. To attend occupation; to make use of the time, attention, or labor of; keep busy or at work; use as an agent.

Nothing advances a business more than when he that is employed is believed to know the mind, and to have the heart, of him that sends him. Donne, Sermons, v.

Tell him I have some business to employ him.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, i. 1.

The mellow harp did not their ears employ,

And mute was all the warlike symphony.

Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xii. 218.

This is a day in which the thoughts of our countrymen ought to be employed on serious subjects.

Addison, Freeholder.

3. To make use of as an instrument or means; apply to any purpose; as, to employ medicines in curing diseases.

Xii d, half to be employed to the vse of the said Cite, and the oder half to the sustentacion of the said frater-nite. English Guilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 336.

Poesie ought not to be abused and employed vpon any vnworthy matter & subject.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 18.

Thou shalt not destroy the trees, . . . and thou shalt not cut them down . . . to employ them in the siege.

Deut. xx. 19.

You must use
The best of your discretion to employ
This gift as I intend it.

Ford, Broken Heart, iii. 5.

4. To occupy; use; apply or devote to an object; pass in occupation: as, to employ an hour, a day, or a week; to employ one's life.

Some men employ their health, an ugly trick,
In making known how oft they have been sick,
And give us in recitals of disease
A doctor's trouble, but without the fees.

Cowper, Conversation, l. 311.

The friends of liberty wasted . . . the time which ought to have been employed in preparing for vigorous national defense.

Macaulay, Sir J. Mackintosh.

= Syn. 2. Employ, Hire. Hire and employ are words of different meaning. To hire is to engage in service for wages. The word does not imply dignity; it is not customary to speak of hiring a teacher or a pastor; we hire a man for wages; we employ him for wages or a salary. To employ is thus a word of wider signification. A man hired to labor is employed, but a man may be employed in a work who is not hired; yet the presumption is that the one employing pays. Employ expresses continuous occupation more often than hire does.

employ (em-ploi'), n. [F. emploi = Sp. empleo = Pg. emprego = It. impiego; from the verb.] Occupation; employment.

As to the genius of the people, they are industrious, . . . but luxurious and extravagant on the days when they have repose from their employes.

With due respect and joy,
I trace the matron at her loved employ.

Crabbe, Works, I. 58.

It happens that your true dull minds are generally preferred for public employ, and especially promoted to city honors; your keen intellects, like razors, being considered too sharp for common service.

Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 161.

employable (em-ploi'á-bl), a. [employ + -able.] That may be employed; capable of being used; fit or proper for use.

employé (on-plwo-yá'), n. The French form of employee.

employedness (em-ploi'ed-nes), n. The state of being employed.

Things yet less consistent with chemistry and employedness than with freedom, or with truth.

Boyle, Works, VI. 38.

employee (em-ploi-é'), n. [employ + -ee, after F. employé, fem. employée, one employed, pp. of employer, employ.] One who works for an employer; a person working for salary or wages; applied to any one so working, but usually only to clerks, workmen, laborers, etc., and but rarely to the higher officers of a corporation or government, or to domestic servants: as, the employees of a railroad company. [Often written employé or employee even as an English word.]

To keep the capital thus invested [in materials for railway construction], and also a large staff of employees, standing idle entails loss, partly negative, partly positive.

H. Spencer, Railway Morals.

employer (em-ploi'ér), n. [= F. employeur.] One who employs; a user; a person engaging or keeping others in service.

By a short contract you are sure of making it the interest of the contractor to exert that skill for the satisfaction of his employers.

And affluent Fortune emptied all her horn.
Tennyson, Death of Wellington.

2. To draw out, pour out, or otherwise remove or discharge, as the contents of a vessel: commonly with out: as, to empty out the water from a pitcher.

What be these two olive branches which through the two golden pipes empty the golden oil out of themselves?
Zech, iv. 12.

3. To discharge; pour out continuously or in a steady course: as, a river empties itself or its waters into the ocean. [A strained use, which it is preferable to avoid, since a river is not emptied by its flow into the ocean.]

The great navigable rivers that empty themselves into it [the Euxine sea].
Arbutnot.

4. To lay waste; make destitute or desolate. [Archaic.]

I . . . will send unto Babylon fanners, that shall fan her, and shall empty her land.
Jer, li. 2.

II. intrans. 1. To become empty.

The chapel empties; and thou may'st be gone
Now, sun.
B. Jonson, Underwoods.

2. To pour out or discharge its contents, as a river into the ocean. [See note under I., 3.]

empty-handed (emp'ti-han'ded), a. Having nothing in the hands; specifically, carrying or bringing nothing of value, as money or a present.

She brought nothing here, but she has been a good girl, a very good girl, and she shall not leave the house empty-handed.
Trollope.

emptying (emp'ti-ing), n. [Verbal n. of empty, v.] 1. The act of making empty.

Boundless Intemperance
In nature is a tyranny; it hath been
The untimely emptying of the happy throne,
And fall of many kings.
Shak, Macbeth, iv. 3.

2. That which is emptied out; specifically [pl.], in the United States, a preparation of yeast from the lees of beer, cider, etc., for leavening. [Colloq., and commonly pronounced emptins.]

A batch o' bread that hain't rise once ain't goin' to rise agin,
An' it's jest money throwed away to put the emptins in.
Lovell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., p. 11.

empty-panneled (emp'ti-pan'el'd), a. Having nothing in the stomach; without food: said of a hawk.

My hawk has been empty-pannell'd these three hours.
Quarles, The Virgin Widow (1656), l. 57.

emptysis (emp'ti-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐμπύσις, a spitting, < ἐμπύειν, spit upon, < ἐν, in, + πύειν, spit, for πύειν* = E. spew, q. v.] In pathol., hemorrhage from the lungs; spitting of blood; hemoptysis.

empugnat, v. t. See impugn.

empurple, impurple (em-,imp-er'pl), v. t.; pret. and pp. empurpled, impurpled, ppr. empurpling, impurpling. [< em-1, im-, + purple.] To tinge or color with purple.

And over it his huge great nose did grow,
Full dreadfully empurpled all with blood.
Spenser, F. Q., iv. vii. 6.

The bright
Pavement, that like a sea of jasper shone,
Impurpled with celestial roses, smiled.
Milton, P. L., iii. 364.

Tho' roseate morn
Pour all her splendours on th' empurpled scene.
T. Warton, Pleasures of Melancholy.

We saw the grass, green from November till April, snowed with daisies, and the floors of the dusky little dingles empurpled with violets.
The Century, XXX. 219.

Empusa (em-pū'sā), n. [NL. (Illiger, 1798), < Gr. ἐμπύσα, a hobgoblin.] 1. A genus of gresorial orthopterous insects, of the family Manidae, having foliaceous appendages on the head and legs, short antennae, and a very slim thorax. E. pauperata is a prettily colored European species of rear-horse or praying-mantis.—2. A genus of lepidopterous insects. Hübner, 1816.—3. In bot., the principal genus of Entomophthoraceae, including, as now understood, the species formerly referred to the genus Entomophthora. The species are parasitic upon insects. That upon the common house-fly is the one most frequently observed, forming a white halo of spores around dead flies adhering to window-panes in autumn. Spores of an Empusa, coming in contact with a suitable insect, enter it by means of hyphal germination and grow rapidly till the insect is killed, forming sometimes mycelium, but commonly, by budding, detached hyphal bodies of spherical or oval form. When the conditions are unfavorable to further growth the hyphal bodies may be transformed into chlamydospores, but under favorable conditions of moisture the hyphal bodies or chlamydospores produce hyphae. At the tip of each is formed a single conidium in a sporangium similar to that of Mucor; or, instead of conidia, thick-walled and spherical resting spores may be formed, either sexually or by conjugation. Twenty-six species are now known in the United States, growing upon insects of all the hexapod orders.

empuset (em-pūs'), n. [< ML. empusa, < Gr. ἐμπύσα, a hobgoblin assuming various shapes: sometimes identified with Hecate.] A goblin or specter. Jer. Taylor.

Empusidae (em-pū'si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Empusa, 1, + -idae.] A family of Orthoptera, taking name from the genus Empusa. Burmeister, 1838.

empuzzlet (em-puz'l), v. t. [< em-1 + puzzle.] To puzzle.

It hath empuzzled the enquiries of others . . . to make out how without fear or doubt he could discourse with such a creature.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., l. 1.

empyrean (em-pi-rē'al or em-pir'ē-al), a. and n. [Formerly also emperiall (simulating imperial); = F. empyréal, < *ML. empyræus (as if < Gr. ἐμπύραϊος*, a false form), LL. empyrius or empyræus, fiery, < LG. ἐμπύριος, for Gr. ἐμπύρος, in, on, or by the fire, fiery, torrid, < ἐν, in, + πύρ = E. fire: see pyre, fire.] 1. a. Formed of pure fire or light; pertaining to the highest and purest region of heaven; pure.

Go, soar with Plato to th' empyreal sphere.
Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 23.

II. n. The empyrean; the region of celestial purity. [Rare.]

The lord-lieutenant looking down sometimes
From the empyreal, to assure their souls Against chance-vulgarisms.
Mrs. Browning.

empyrean (em-pi-rē'an or em-pir'ē-an), a. and n. [= F. empyrée = Fr. empyrée, n., = Sp. empyreo = Pg. empyreo = It. empyreo, adj., < *ML. empyræus, neut. as a noun, empyræum*: see empyreal.] 1. a. Empyrean; celestially refined.

In th' empyrean heaven, the blessed abode,
The Thrones and the Dominions prostrate lie,
Not daring to behold their angry God.
Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, l. 1114.

Yet upward she [the goddess] incessant flies;
Resolv'd to reach the high empyrean Sphere.
Prior, Carmen Seculare (1700), st. 23.

Lisping empyrean will I sometimes teach Thine honeyed tongue.
Keats, Endymion, ii.

II. n. The region of pure light and fire; the highest heaven, where the pure element of fire was supposed by the ancients to exist: the same as the ether, the ninth heaven according to ancient astronomy.

The deep-domed empyrean Rings to the roar of an angel onset.
Tennyson, Experiments in Quantity.

empyreum (em-pi-rē'um), n. [ML. empyræum*: see empyreal.] Same as empyrean.

Passed through all
The winding orbs like an Intelligence,
Up to the empyreum. B. Jonson, Fortunate Isles.

empyreuma (em-pi-rē'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐμπύρευμα, a live coal covered with ashes to preserve the fire, < ἐμπύρειν, set on fire, kindle, < ἐμπύω, on fire: see empyreal.] In chem., the pungent disagreeable taste and odor of most animal or vegetable substances when burned in close vessels, or when subjected to destructive distillation.

empyreumatic, empyreumatical (em'pi-rē-mat'ik, -i-kal), a. [< empyreuma(-) + -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to or having the taste or smell of slightly burned animal or vegetable substances.

—Empyreumatic oil, an oil obtained from organic substances when decomposed by a strong heat.

empyreumatize (em-pi-rē-mā-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. empyreumatized, ppr. empyreumatizing. [< empyreuma(-) + -ize.] To render empyreumatic; decompose by heat. [Rare.]

empyric (em-pir'i-kal), a. [< Gr. ἐμπύριος, in fire, on fire: see empyreal.] Of or pertaining to combustion or combustibility. [Rare.]

Of these and some other empyric marks I shall say no more, as they do not tell us the defects of the soils.
Kirwan, Manures, p. 81.

empyrosist (em-pi-rō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐμπύρωσις, a kindling, heating, < ἐμπύρειν, equiv. to ἐμπύρειν, kindle: see empyreuma.] A general fire; a conflagration.

The former opinion, that held these cataclisms and empyroses universal, was such as held that it put a total consumption unto things in this lower world, especially that of conflagration.
Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

empyryt, n. [ME. empiry, < OF. empyree, F. empyrée: see empyrean.] The empyrean.

This heaven is call'd empyry: that is at say, heaven that is tyry.
Hampole, Prick of Conscience, l. 7761.

emraudt, n. An obsolete form of emerald.

emrod¹, n. An obsolete form of emerald.

emrod², n. An obsolete form of hemorrhoid.

emu¹ (ē'mū), n. [Also emew, emew; = Pg. ema; prob. from a native name.] 1. A large Australian three-toed ratite bird of the genus Dromæus (which see), of which there are several species, as D. nova-hollandie, D. ater, and D. irroratus. These birds resemble cassowaries, but belong to a different genus and subfamily, and are easily distinguished by having no casque or helmet on the head, which, with the neck, is more completely feathered. The plumage is sooty-brown or blackish, and very copious, like long curly hair, there being two plumes to the quills, so that each feather seems double. The wings are rudimentary, useless for flight, and concealed in the plumage. The emus are intermediate in size between the cassowaries and the ostriches. The species first named above is the one most commonly seen in confinement.

Emu (Dromæus nova-hollandie).

2. (a) [cap.] [NL., orig. in the form Emeu.] A genus of cassowaries. Barrère, 1745. (b) The specific name of the galeated cassowary of Ceram, in the form emew. Latham, 1790. (c) The specific name of the east Australian Dromæus nova-hollandie, in the form emu. Stephens.

emu² (ē'mū), n. An Australian wood used for turners' work. Laslett.

emulable (em'ū-la-bl), a. [< emul(ate) + -able.] That may be emulated; capable of attainment by emulous effort; worthy of emulation. [Rare.]

This I say to all, for none are so complete but they may espie some imitable and emulable good, even in meaner Christians.
Abp. Leighton, On 1 Pet. iii. 13.

emulate (em'ū-lāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. emulated, ppr. emulating. [< L. emulatus, pp. of emulari (> E. emule, v.), try to equal or excel, be emulous, < emulus (> F. emule, n.), trying to equal or excel in qualities or actions; vie or compete with the character, condition, or performance of; rival imitatively or competitively: as, to emulate good or bad examples; to emulate one's friend or an ancient author.

I would have Him emulate you: 'tis no shame to follow
The better precedent.
B. Jonson, Catiline.

The birds sing louder, sweeter,
And every note they emulate one another.
Fletcher, Pilgrim, v. 4.

He [Dryden] is always imitating—no, that is not the word, always emulating—somebody in his more strictly poetical attempts, for in that direction he always needed some external impulse to set his mind in motion.
Lovell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 41.

24. To be a match or counterpart for; imitate; resemble.

Thine eye would emulate the diamond.
Shak, M. W. of W., iii. 3.

It is likewise attended with a delirium, fury, and an involuntary laughter, the convulsion emulating this motion.
Arbutnot.

The blossom opening to the day,
The dew of heav'n refin'd,
Could nought of purity display,
To emulate his mind.
Goldsmith, Vicar, viii.

34. To envy.

The council then present, emulating my successes, would not think it fit to spare me for the men to be hazarded in those unknown regions.

Capit. John Smith, True Travels, I. 135.

emulate† (em'ū-lāt), a. [< L. emulatus, pp.: see the verb.] Emulative; eager to equal or excel.

Our last king . . .

Was, as you know, by Fortinbras of Norway,
Thereto prick'd on by a most emulate pride,
Dard to the combat. Shak., Hamlet, I. 1.

emulation (em'ū-lā'shən), n. [= F. émulation = Fr. emulacio = Sp. emulacion = Pg. emulação = It. emulazione, < L. emulatio(n)-, < emulari, emulate; see emulate.] 1. Love of superiority; desire or ambition to equal or excel others; the instinct that incites to effort for the attainment of equal or superior excellence or estimation in any respect.

Among the lower animals we see many symptoms of emulation, but in them its effects are perfectly insignificant when compared with those which it produces in human conduct. . . . In our own race emulation operates in an infinite variety of directions, and is one of the principal sources of human improvement.

D. Stewart, Moral Powers, I. II. § 5.

Let the man who thinks he is actuated by generous emulation only, and wishes to know whether there be anything of envy in the case, examine his own heart.

Beattie, Moral Science, I. II. § 5.

2. Effort to equal or excel in qualities or actions; imitative rivalry, as of that which one admires in another or others: as, the emulation of great actions, or of the rich by the poor.

Then younger brothers may eat grasses, yf they cannot achieve to excell; which will bring a blessed emulation to England. Books of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), I. 11.

The apostle exhorts the Corinthians to an holy and general emulation of the charity of the Macedonians, in contributing freely to the relief of the poor saints at Jerusalem. South, Sermons.

But now, since the rewards of honour are taken away, that virtuous emulation is turned into direct malice. Dryden, Essay on Dram. Poesy.

3†. Antagonistic rivalry; malicious or injurious contention; strife for superiority. [Unusual.]

What madness rules in brain-sick men,
When, for so slight and frivolous a cause,
Such factious emulations shall arise.

Shak., I. Hen. VI., IV. 1.

My heart laments that virtue cannot live
Out of the teeth of emulation. Shak., J. C., II. 3.

= Syn. 1 and 2. Emulation, Competition, Rivalry. The natural love of superiority is known as emulation; in common use the word signifies the desire and the resulting endeavor to equal or surpass another or others in some quality, attainment, or achievement. It is intrinsically neutral both as to time and motive, but it is most frequently applied to the relations of contemporaries or associates, and to feelings and efforts of an honorable nature. Competition is the act of striving against others; the word is used only where the object to be attained is pretty clearly in mind, and that object is not mere superiority, but some definite thing; as, competition for a prize; competition in business. Rivalry, unless qualified by some favorable adjective, is generally a contest in which the competitors push their several interests in an ungenerous spirit, malignant feelings being easily a result. Rivalry may be general in its character: as, the rivalry between two states or cities; in such cases it may be friendly and honorable.

A noble emulation heats your breast. Dryden.

Envy, to which th' ignoble mind's a slave,
Is emulation in the learn'd or brave.

Pope, Essay on Man, II. 191.

Competition for the crown, there is none nor can be. Bacon.

When the worship of rank and the worship of wealth are in competition, it may at least be said that the existence of the two idols diminishes by dividing the force of each superstition. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., II.

Far-sighted summoner of War and Waste
To fruitful strifes and rivalries of peace.

Tennyson, Idylls of the King, Ded.

emulative (em'ū-lā-tiv), a. [< emulate + -ive.] Inclined to emulation; rivaling; disposed to compete imitatively.

Yet since her swift departure thence she press'd,
He saw th' election on himself would rest:
While all, with emulative zeal, demand
To fill the number of th' elected band.

Hooke, tr. of Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, v.

Emulative power

Flowed in thy line through undergenerate veins.

Wordsworth, Eccles. Sonnets, I. 27.

emulatively (em'ū-lā-tiv-ly), adv. In an emulative manner.

emulator (em'ū-lā-tor), n. [F. émulateur = Sp. Pg. emulador = It. emulatore, < L. emulatore, < emulari, emulate; see emulate.] One who emulates; an imitative rival or competitor.

As Virgil rivalled Homer, so Milton was the emulator of both these. Warburton, Divine Legation, II. § 4.

Full of ambition, an envious emulator of every man's good parts, a secret and villainous contriver against me his natural brother. Shak., As you Like It, I. 1.

emulatory (em'ū-lā-tō-ri), a. [< emulate + -ory.] Arising out of emulation; of or belonging to emulation; denoting emulation.

Whether some secret and emulatory brawls passed between Zipporah and Miriam. Bp. Hall, Aaron and Miriam.

At ale-drinking emulatory poems are sung

Between chivalrous people.

O'Curry, Anc. Irish, II. xxi.

Yet, emuling my pipe, he took in hand
My pipe, before that emuled of many.

Spenser, Colin Clout, I. 72.

This is the ground whereon the young Nassau,
Emuling that day his ancestor's renown,
Received his hurt.

Southey, Pilgrimage to Waterloo, III.

emulge† (ē-mulj'), v. t. [< L. emulgere (> It. emulgere), milk out, drain out, < e, out, + mulgere = E. milk.] To drain out. Bailey.

emulgence (ē-mulj'ens), n. [< emulgent; see -ence.] The act of draining out. [Rare.]

Weak men would be rendered nervous by the flattery of a woman's worship; or they would be for returning it, at least partially, as though it could be banded to and fro without emulgence of the poetry.

G. Meredith, The Egoist, xiv.

emulgent (ē-mulj'ent), a. and n. [= F. émulent = Sp. Pg. It. emulgente, < L. emulgen(-t)s, ppr. of emulgere, milk out, drain out; see emulge.] 1. a. In anat., draining out: applied to the renal arteries and veins, as draining the urine from the blood.

II. n. 1. In anat., an emulgent vessel.—2. In pharmacology, a remedy which excites the flow of bile.

emulus (em'ū-lus), a. [< L. æmulus, striving to equal or excel, rivaling; in a bad sense, envious, jealous; akin to imitari, imitate; see imitate.] 1. Desirous of equaling or excelling, as what one admires; inclined to imitative rivalry: with of before an object: as, emulous of another's example or virtues.

By strength

They measure all, of other excellence

Not emulous.

Milton, P. L., VI. 822.

The leaders, picked men of a courage and vigor tried and augmented in fifty battles, are emulous to distinguish themselves above each other by new merits, as clemency, hospitality, splendor of living.

Emerson, War.

2. Rivaling; competitive.

Both striving in emulous contention whether shall add more pleasure or more profit to the Cite.

Purchase, Pilgrimage, p. 237.

3†. Envious; jealous; contentiously eager.

He is not emulous, as Achilles is. Shak., T. and C., II. 3.

What the Gaul or Moor could not effect,
Nor emulous Carthage, with her length of spite, Shall be the work of one. B. Jonson, Catiline.

emulously (em'ū-lus-ly), adv. With emulation, or desire of equaling or excelling.

So tempt thy him, and emulously vie
To bribe a voice that empires would not buy.

Landgrave, To the Earl of Peterborough.

emulousness (em'ū-lus-nes), n. The quality of being emulous.

emulsic (ē-mul'sik), a. [< emuls(in) + -ic.] In chem., pertaining to or procured from emulsion. — Emulsic acid, an acid procured from the albumen of almonds.

emulsification (ē-mul'si-fi-kā'shən), n. The act of emulsifying, or the state of being emulsified.

emulsify (ē-mul'si-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. emulsified, ppr. emulsifying. [< L. emulsus, pp. (see emulsion), + -ficare, make.] To make or form into an emulsion; emulsinize.

Pancreatic juice emulsifies fat.

Darwin, Vegetable Mould, p. 37.

emulsin (ē-mul'sin), n. [< L. emulsus, pp. of emulgere, milk out, drain out (see emulsion), + -in.] In chem., an albuminous or caseous substance found in the white part of both sweet and bitter almonds, and making up about one quarter of their entire weight. When pure it is an odorless and tasteless white powder, which is soluble in water and acts as a ferment, converting the amygdalin of almonds into oil of bitter almonds, hydrocyanic acid, and a sugar.

emulsione, < L. as if emulsio(n)-*, < emulsus, pp. of emulgere, milk out, drain out; see emulge.] 1†. A draining out.

Were it not for the emulsion to flesh and blood in being of a public factious spirit, I might pity your infirmity.

Howard, Man of Newmarket.

2. A mixture of liquids insoluble in one another, where one is suspended in the other in the form of minute globules, as the fat (butter) in milk: as, an emulsion of cod-liver oil.—3. A mixture in which solid particles are suspended in a liquid in which they are insoluble: as, a camphor emulsion.—4. In photog., a name given to various emulsified mixtures used in making dry plates, etc. See photography.

emulsionize (ē-mul'shən-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. emulsinized, ppr. emulsinizing. [< emulsion + -ize.] To make an emulsion of; emulsify: as, pancreatic juice emulsinizes fat.

This treatment, continued for seven or eight minutes, suffices to set free the fat of the milk from its emulsinized state.

Med. News, I. 587.

emulsive (ē-mul'siv), a. [= F. émulsiif = Sp. Pg. It. emulsivo, < L. emuls-us, pp. (see emulsion), + E. -ive.] 1. Softening.—2. Yielding oil by expression: as, emulsive seeds.—3. Producing or yielding a milk-like substance: as, emulsive acids.—Emulsive oil, rancid olive-oil: in this state adapted for producing an emulsion, and used in dyeing as a fixing agent for aluminum or iron mordants.

emunctory (ē-mungk'tō-ri), a. and n. [= F. émonctoire = Sp. Pg. emunctorio = It. emunctorio, *< L. emunctorius, adj., found only as a noun, neut., < LL. emunctorium, a pair of snufflers, < L. emunctus, pp. of emungere, wipe or blow the nose, < e, out, + mungere (scarcely used), blow the nose, = Gr. ἀπο-μύσσειν, mid. ἀπο-μύσσειν, blow the nose; akin to mucus, q. v.] 1. a. Excretory; depuratory; serving to excrete, carry off, and discharge from the body waste products or effete matters.

II. n.; pl. emunctories (-riz). A part or an organ of the body which has an excretory or depuratory function; an organ or a part which eliminates effete or excrementitious matters or products of decomposition, as carbonic dioxide, urea, cholesterol, etc.

emuscation† (ē-mus-kā'shən), n. [< L. emuscare, clear from moss, < e, out, + muscus, moss.] A freeing from moss. [Rare.]

The most infallible art of emuscation is taking away the cause (which is superfluous moisture in clayey and spewing grounds), by dressing with lime. Bvelyn, Sylva, xxix.

emu-wren (ē-mū-ren), n. A small Australian bird of the genus Stipiturus. The webs of the tail-feathers are decomposed, somewhat like the plumage of the emu. There are several species; S. malachurus is an example. See cut under Stipiturus.

emyd, emyde (em'id, em'id or -id), n. [= F. émyde.] A member of the family Emydidæ; a fresh-water tortoise or terrapin.

Emyda (em'i-dā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐμύς or ἐμύς (ἐμύς, ἐμύς), the fresh-water tortoise, Emys luteola: see Emys.] A genus of soft-shelled tortoises, of the family Trionychidæ, having the shell very flat and subcircular in outline, and the toes webbed and with only three claws. They are aquatic, and are often found buried in the mud. A. mutica, of North America, is a comparatively small species, with a smooth shell. The genus is closely related to Apisdonectes (or Trionyx).

Emyda (em'i-dē), n. pl. Same as Emydidæ.

emyde, n. See emyd.

Emydea (e-mid'ē-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Emys (Emyd-) + -ea.] The name given by Huxley to a group of the Chelonina, having usually horny cutting jaws, uncovered by lips, the tympanum exposed, the limbs slenderer than in Testudinina, with 5-clawed digits united by a web only, and the horny plates of the carapace and plastron well developed. The Emydea as thus defined compose the river- and marsh-tortoises, and are divisible into two groups, the terrapins and the chelonines. See terrapin, Chelonina.

emydian (e-mid'i-an), a. [< Emys (Emyd-) + -ian.] Of or pertaining to the group of tortoises typified by the genus Emys.

emydid (em'i-did), n. A tortoise of the family Emydidæ.

Emydidæ (e-mid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., also written contr. Emyda; < Emys (Emyd-) + -idæ.] A family of chelonians, the so-called fresh-water turtles, fresh-water tortoises, or terrapins. It includes a large series of diverse forms, some of which are as terrestrial as the true land-tortoises (Testudinidæ), and have a highly convex carapace, though most are aquatic, with flattened shell. There are about 60 species, of numerous genera, agreeing in their hard shell, well-formed feet adapted both for walking and swimming, usually 5-toed before and 4-toed behind, and furnished with claws. They inhabit northern temperate and tropical regions, within which they are widely distributed.

A few occur in salt or brackish water. The leading genera are Emys, Cistudo (the box-tortoises), Chelonia (the speckled turtles), etc. The salt-water terrapin of the Atlantic States, Malaclemmys palustris, well known to captives, belongs to this family. By some the name is supplanted by Clemmydidae, the genus Emys being referred to the family Cistudinidae, and by others the family is considered to be inseparable from the Testudinidae. Also Emyda. See cut under carapace, Cistudo, and terrapin.

emydin (em'i-din), n. [< Gr. ἐμύς (ēmys), the fresh-water tortoise, + -in².] In chem., a white nitrogenous substance contained in the yolk of turtles' eggs. It is closely related to, if not identical with, vitellin.

Emydina¹ (em-i-dī'nā), n. [N.L., < Gr. ἐμύς or ἐμύδ (ēmys, ēmyd-), the fresh-water tortoise, + -ina¹.] A genus of fresh-water tortoises, typical of the Emydidinae.

Emydina² (em-i-dī'nā), n. pl. [N.L., < Emys (Emyd-) + -ina².] A subfamily of the Emydidae or Clemmydidae, typified by the genus Emys, and including most species of the family. It was limited by Gray to those tortoises which have the head covered with a thin hard skin, the zygomatic arch distinct, the fore limbs covered in front by thin scales and cross-bands, and the breeding toes strong and webbed.

Emydidae (em-i-dī'nā), n. pl. [N.L., < Emydina¹ + -idae.] A family of soft-shelled tortoises, typified by the genus Emyda, including a few Asiatic species referred usually to the Trionychidae, having the edge of the disk strengthened by a series of internal bones, the skull oblong, convex, and swollen, and the palate with a central groove. Also Emydidinae.

emydoid (em'i-doid), a. and n. I. a. Resembling or related to a tortoise of the genus Emys; belonging to the family Emydidae.

II. a. A tortoise of the family Emydidae.

Emydidae (em-i-doi'dē), n. pl. [N.L., < Emys (Emyd-) + -idae.] A family of tortoises, typified by the genus Emys, including the Clemmydidae and Cistudinidae, and divided into 5 subfamilies. L. Agassiz. See cut under Cistudo.

Emydosauria (em'i-dō-sā'ri-ā), n. pl. [N.L., < Gr. ἐμύς or ἐμύδ (ēmys, ēmyd-), the fresh-water tortoise, + σαύρος, a lizard.] One of several names of the order Crocodylia: so called from the fact that the dermal armor of the crocodiles and alligators suggests the shell of a tortoise. De Blainville.

Emys (em'is), n. [N.L., < Gr. ἐμύς or ἐμύδ, the fresh-water tortoise.] A genus of tortoises, giving name to the Emydidae. The name has been variously employed: (a) For fresh-water tortoises in general of the family Clemmydidae, such as E. latior of Europe, now generally called Clemmys caspica, and numerous American species. (b) Restricted to certain box-tortoises belonging to the family now called Cistudinidae, such as the box-tortoise of Europe, Emys europaea, which is the emys of Aristotle and the ancients, and the Emys blandingi of North America.

en (en), n. [*< ME. *en, < AS. en, < L. en, < e, the usual assistant vowel, + n.] 1. The name of the letter N, n. It is rarely written, the symbol N, n, being used instead.—2. In printing, a space half as wide as an em, sometimes used as a standard in reckoning the amount of a compositor's work. See em^{1, 2}.

en-1. [ME. en-, < OF. en-, rarely F. en- = Sp. Pg. en- = It. en-, in-, < L. in- (see in-2), an adverbial or prepositional prefix, conveying the idea, according as the verb is one of rest or of motion, of existence 'in' a place or thing, or of motion, direction, or inclination 'into' or 'to' a place or thing, < in, prep., in, into, = E. in: see in¹. In later L. in- usually became im-, and so in Rom. en- usually becomes em-, before labials: see em-1, im-2.] A common adverbial or prepositional prefix, representing Latin in-, meaning primarily 'in' or 'into'. Appearing first in Middle English words derived through Old French from Latin, en-1 (before labials em-) has come to be freely used as a prefix of words of native as well as of Romance or Latin origin, being equivalent to in-1 of pure English origin and to in-2 of direct Latin origin, and hence often restored to the pure Latin form. Hence forms in en-1 (em-1) and in-2 (im-2) are frequently found (even in Middle English) co-existing, as enclose, inclose, enquire, inquire, enwrap, inwrap, enfold, infold, with, however, a tendency in one or other of the forms to disappear, or to become partly differentiated in use. Before labials en- becomes em-, as in embellish, embrace, but may remain unchanged before m, as in emerge or emerge. As a verbal prefix, en-, when joined to a noun, or a verb from a noun, may retain its original meaning of 'in' ('put in'), as in engage (put in a cage), enfold, enfetter, encapsule, etc.; or when prefixed to an adjective or a noun, it may denote a change from one state into another ('make . . .'), as in enable (make able), enrich, enslave, enfranchise, enlarge, and hence has often the effect simply of a verb-forming prefix. In some cases, prefixed to a verb, it has no additional force, as in enkindle, encompass.

en-2. [E. en-, etc., < L. en-, < Gr. ἐν- (before gutturals ἐν-), a prefix conveying with verbs the idea of 'in' or 'at' a place, etc., with adjectives the possession of a quality, 'having,' 'with,' 'in' (= L. in-, > en-1, above), < ἐν, prep., = L. in = E. in: see in¹.] An adverbial or prepositional prefix of Greek origin, meaning primarily 'in': chiefly in scientific or technical words of modern formation, as in encephalon, enanthema, etc.

In some cases, prefixed to a verb, it has no additional force, as in enkindle, encompass.

(= L. in-, > en-1, above), < ἐν, prep., = L. in = E. in: see in¹.] An adverbial or prepositional prefix of Greek origin, meaning primarily 'in': chiefly in scientific or technical words of modern formation, as in encephalon, enanthema, etc.

en-1. [*(1) ME. -en (sometimes spelled -in, -yn), later often -e, the two forms long coexisting; earliest ME. always -en (weak verbs -en or -ien), < AS. -an (weak verbs -an or -ian, -igean), ONorth. -a, -ia = OS. -an (-ōn) = OFries. -a = D. -en = OHG. -an (-ēn, -ōn), MHG. Teut. inf. suffix, quite different from the L. inf. suffix, -re (-āre, -ēre, -īre), but cognate with Gr. -ειν, later reg. -ειν, and orig. dat. of *ana, an orig. noun suffix. (2) ME. -en, often only -e, < AS. -en = OS. -an = OFries. Fries. MD. D. MLG. LG. -en = OHG. -an, MHG. G. -en = Icel. -inn = Sw. Dan. -en = Goth. -ans, the reg. pp. suffix of strong verbs, = L. -nus = Gr. -νός = Skt. -nas, an adj. suffix. (3) < ME. -en-en, -n-en (the final syllable being a different suffix, -en¹ (1)), < AS. -n-an, -n-ian (as in fastnian, > E. fasten, make fast) = Goth. -n-an, prop. intr., as in Goth. fullnan, become full, in verbs formed on the pp. of strong verbs, -an-s = AS. and E. -en, etc. See (2), above. (4) ME. -en, often -e, in later ME. a general pl. suffix, in earlier ME. confined to ind. and subj. pret. pl. and subj. pres. the ind. pres. (and impv. pl.) having -eth, < AS. -ath, -iath. The AS. verb-forms with pl. term. -n were (in all 3 persons) subj. pres. -en (-ien), ind. pret. -on (-an), subj. -en. Like forms are found in the other Teut. tongues, being worn-down and assimilated forms of elements orig. of different origin.] A termination of various origin, used in the formation of verbs. (a) The infinitive suffix, now obsolete, as in Middle English singen, escapen, pullen, etc. In Middle English sing, escape, pull, etc. In late Middle English the n fell away (singe, escape, pull, etc.), but the e continued to be pronounced, at least optionally, until near the end of the Middle English period; in modern English the e, though always silent, is retained in spelling after a single consonant following a long vowel (as in escape) and in some other positions. (b) The suffix of the past participle of strong verbs (Middle English and Anglo-Saxon -en), as in risen, written, etc., past participles of rise, write, etc. In Middle English the -n often fell away (risen or rise, written or write, etc.); hence in modern English many coexisting forms in -en and -e silent or absent, as broken and broke, written and writ, beaten and beat, sunken and sunk, etc. In most of these pairs there is a slight differentiation of use (as sunken, drunken, adj., sunk, drunk, pp.), or one form is obsolete (writ, pp., etc.) or regarded as 'incorrect' (broke, spoke, etc.), or is merely vulgar (viz for risen, etc.). In some cases the past participle in -en is modern, the verb being originally weak (with past participle in -ed²), as in worn, pp. of wear. In most of such instances the older form in -ed² is still in prevalent use, as in sewed or sewn, saved or sawn, proved or proven, etc., the -ed² being in some instances absorbed, as in hid or hidden, chid or chidden. (c) A suffix forming verbs from adjectives, as weaken, fatten, etc. Originally such verbs were only intransitive ('become weak, fat, etc.'), but now they are also transitive ('make weak, fat', etc.). (d) In Middle English, a plural suffix of verbs: as, they aren, ween, sayen, singen, vungen, etc. It is now reduced to silent -e or entirely lost.*

en-3. [*< ME. -en, < AS. -en (gen. dat. -enne), earlier -in, -inne = OHG. -in (-inna), MHG. -in, -inne, Gr. -in = L. -ina (as in regina, queen) = Gr. -iva, -a-iva = Skt. -āni, fem. suffix.] A feminine suffix, of which only a few relics exist in native English words, as, for example, vixen, from Anglo-Saxon fūxen (= German fūchsin), a female fox: in some instances regarded as having a diminutive force, as in maiden, from Anglo-Saxon mægdan, etc. See vixen, maiden, and compare elfin.*

the termination is of Middle English origin, except in oxen (from Anglo-Saxon oxan), eyne, een (from Anglo-Saxon eygan), hosen (from Anglo-Saxon hosan), peasen (from Anglo-Saxon peasan).

en⁵. A suffix of various other origins besides those mentioned above: often ultimately identical with -an (Latin -anus), as in citizen, denizen, dozen, etc., but having also, as in often, midden, etc., other sources ascertainable upon reference to the word concerned.

enable (e-nā'bl), v.; pret. and pp. enabled, ppr. enabling. [Formerly also inable; < ME. enablen; < en-1 + able¹.] I. trans. 1. To make able; furnish with adequate power, ability, means, or authority; render competent.

Temperance gives nature her full play, and enables her to exert herself in all her force and vigour. Spectator, No. 195.

No science of heat was possible until the invention of the thermometer enabled men to measure the degree of temperature. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 34.

2†. To put in an efficient state or condition; endow; equip; fit out.

Joy openeth and enableth the heart. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, I.

You are beholden to them, sir, that have taken this pains for you, and my friend, Master Truewit, who enabled them for the business. B. Jonson, Epicæne, v. 1.

= Syn. 1. To empower, qualify, capacitate.

II. intrans. To give ability or competency. For matter of policy and government, that learning should rather hurt than enable theunto is a thing very improbable. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 16.

enablement (e-nā'bl-ment), n. [< enable + -ment.] The act of enabling.

Learning . . . hath no less power and efficacy in enablement towards martial and military virtue and prowess. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 12.

enach (en'āch), n. [Gael. eìnach, bounty.] In old Scots law, amends or satisfaction for a crime, fault, or trespass.

enact (e-nakt'), v. t. [< ME. enacten; < en-1 + act.] 1. To decree; establish by the will of the supreme power; pass into a statute or established law; specifically, to perform the last act of a legislature to, as a bill, giving it validity as a law; give sanction to, as a bill.

Through all the periods and changes of the Church it hath been prov'd that God hath still reserv'd to himself the right of enacting Church-Government. Milton, Church-Government, i. 2.

It was enacted that, for every ton of Malmsey or Tyne wine brought into England, ten good bowstaves should also be imported. Encyc. Brit., II. 372.

2. To act; perform; effect.

The king enacts more wonders than a man, Daring an opposite to every danger. Shak., Rich. III., v. 4.

3. To act the part of; represent on or as on the stage.

Ham. And what did you enact? Pol. I did enact Julius Caesar: I was killed i' the Capitol; Brutus killed me. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2.

Enacting clause, the introductory clause of a legislative bill or act, beginning "Be it enacted by," etc. A common means of defeating a bill in its initial stages is a motion to strike out its enacting clause, which if successful carries all the rest with it.

enact¹, n. [ME.; < enact, v.] An enactment; an act.

This enacte so to endure by force of this present yelde [glid]. English Glids (E. E. T. S.), p. 404.

enactive (e-nak'tiv), a. [< enact + -ive.] Having power to enact, or establish as a law.

enactment (e-nakt'ment), n. [< enact + -ment.] 1. The act of enacting or decreeing; specifically, the passing of a bill into a law; the act of giving validity to a law by vote or decree.

In 1176, precise enactment established the jury system, still rude and imperfect, as the usual mode of trial. Welsh, Eng. Lit., I. 61.

2. A law enacted; a statute; an act.

If we look simply at the written enactments, we should conclude that a considerable portion of the pagan worship was, at an early period, absolutely and universally suppressed. Lecky, Rationalism, I. 58.

3. The acting of a part or representation of a character in a play. = Syn. 2. Statute, Ordinance, etc. See law.

enactor (e-nakt'or), n. [< enact + -or.] 1. One who enacts or decrees; specifically, one who decrees or establishes a law.

This is an assertion by which the great Author of our nature, and Enactor of the law of good and evil, is highly dishonoured and blasphemed. Ep. Atterbury, Sermons, II., Pref.

2. One who acts or performs. Shak.

enacture (e-nak'tūr), n. [< enact + -ure.] Purpose; effect; action.

The violence of either grief or joy
Their own enactures with themselves destroy.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2.

enaget, v. t. [OF. enagier, enagier, declare of age, pp. enagré, aged, < en- + aage, age: see age.] To age; make old.

That never hail did Harvest prelude,
That never frost, nor snow, nor slippery ice
The fields en-ag'd.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii, Eden.

Enaliornis (e-nal-i-ôr'nis), n. [Gr. ἐνάλιος, in, on, or of the sea (< ἐν, in, < ἀλς, the sea), < ὄρνις, a bird.] A genus of fossil Cretaceous birds, discovered by Barrett in 1858 in the Upper Greensand of Cambridge, England. It was described by Seeley in 1866 under the name Pelagornis (P. barretti), which, being preoccupied by Pelagornis of Lartet (1857), was renamed Enaliornis by Seeley in 1869. The remains appear to be those of a true bird, resembling a penguin in some respects.

enaliosaur (e-nal'i-ô-sâr), n. One of the Enaliosauria.

Enaliosauria (e-nal'i-ô-sâ-ri-â), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐνάλιος, living in the sea (< ἐν, = E. in, < ἀλς, the sea), < σαῦρος, lizard.] A superordinal group of gigantic aquatic Mesozoic reptiles, with a very long body, naked leathery skin, paddle-like limbs, numerous teeth in long jaws, and biconcave vertebrae. The group contained the ichthyosaurs, plesiosaurs, and other marine monsters now placed in different orders. The term is now little used; it sometimes, however, still covers the two current orders Ichthyosauria and Plesiosaurs, or Ichthyopterygia and Sauropterygia.

enaliosaurian (e-nal'i-ô-sâ-ri-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Enaliosauria.

II. n. One of the Enaliosauria; an enaliosaur.

enallage (e-nal'â-jê), n. [= F. enallage = Sp. enallage = Pg. It. enallage, < L. enallage, < Gr. ἐναλλάγῃ, an interchange, < ἐναλλάσσειν, interchange, < ἐν, in, < ἀλλάσσειν, change, < ἄλλος, other: see allo-.] In gram., a figure consisting in the substitution of one form, inflection, or part of speech for another. Special names are given to subdivisions of this figure. The substitution of one part of speech for another is antitneria; that of one case for another is antiposis. Interchange of the functions of two cases in one phrase is a form of hypallage. Enallage of gender can hardly be illustrated in English. Antiposis is exemplified in the colloquial "It's me" for "It is I." Enallage of number is seen in the royal and literary "we" for "I," and in our modern established "you" for "thou."

Not changing one word for another, by their accidents or cases, as the Enallage.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 143.

Enallostegæ (en-a-lost'e-gâ), n. pl. [NL. (F. Enallostegæ, D'Orbigny), < Gr. ἐν, in, < ἄλλος, other (one besides), < τέγος, roof.] A division of foraminifers, having the cells disposed in two alternating rows.

enambush (en-am'bush), v. t. [en-1 + ambush.] To place or conceal in ambush.

Explor'd th' embattled van, the deep'ning line,
Th' enambush'd phalanx, and the springing mine.

Cæthron, Elegy on Capt. Hughes.

enamel (e-nam'el), n. [ME. enamaile (with prefix en-, due to the verb enamelen), prop. amaile*, amel, amell, amelle, amall, aumayl, later ammell (> D. G. email = Dan. emaille = Sw. emailj). < OF. email, F. émail, enamel: see amaj.] 1. In ceram., a vitrified substance, either transparent or opaque, applied as a coating to pottery and porcelain of many kinds. It is simply a fusible kind of glass, and when transparent is commonly called glaze. A vitreous coating of similar character is applied to a class of iron utensils for cooking, etc., and is made to serve other useful purposes.

2. In the fine arts, a vitreous substance or glass, opaque or transparent, and variously colored, applied as a coating on a surface of metal or of porcelain (see def. 1) for purposes of decoration. It consists of easily fusible salts, such as the silicates and borates of sodium, potassium, lead, etc., to which various earths and metallic oxides are added to give the desired colors. These enamels are now prepared in the form of sticks, like sealing-wax, and for use are pulverized, and applied to the surface either dry or moistened so as to form a paste. The object to be enameled is then exposed to a moderate temperature in a muffle, and the vitreous substance becomes sufficiently fluid to form a brilliant and adhesive coating. Enamels in modern times include an infinite number of tints; but those of the ancient Orientals and of the Byzantine empire present but few colors, and those distinctly contrasting. See def. 3, and Limoges enamel, below.

3. Enamel-work: a piece or sort of work whose chief decorative quality lies in the enamel itself: as, a fine piece of cloisonné enamel; a specimen of enamel à jour. Of this work there are three distinct classes: (1) cloisonné enamel, in which partitions surrounding the compartments of enamel of each different color are formed of wire of rectangular section secured to the body or foundation; (2) champlevé enamel, in which the surface of the background is engraved or hollowed out to receive the enamel; (3) surface-enamel, in which the whole surface of a plate of metal is covered with the enamel, which when fused affords a smooth ground for painting. A familiar instance of the last kind of enamel-work is the dial of a common watch, which is enameled on copper in white, the figures being painted upon it in black enamel. Champlevé enamel is most used for jewelry and similar decorative work.

About her necke a sort of faire rubies
In white floures of right fine enamaile.

The Assembly of Ladies, l. 534.

4. Any smooth, glossy surface resembling enamel, but produced by means of varnish or lacquer, or in some other way not involving vitrification: as, the enamel of enameled leather, paper, slate, etc.—5. In anat., the hardest part of a tooth; the very dense, smooth, glistening substance which crowns a tooth or coats a part of its surface: distinguished from dentin and from cement. It is always superficial, and represents a special modification of epithelial substance. It is usually white, sometimes red, as in the front teeth of most rodents, or reddish-black, as in the teeth of most shrews. See cut under tooth.

All the bones of the body are covered with a periosteum, except the teeth; where it ceases, and an enamel of ivory, which saws and files will hardly touch, comes into its place.

Paley, Nat. Theol., xi.

6. Figuratively, gloss; polish.

There is none of the ingenuity of Filicaja in the thought, none of the hard and brilliant enamel of Petrarch in the style.

Macaulay.

7. In cosmetics, a coating applied to the skin, giving the appearance of a beautiful complexion.—Battersea enamel, a kind of surface-enamel produced in Battersea, London, in the eighteenth century. The pieces of this enamel are usually decorated by a transfer process similar to that used for porcelain and English delft; they include needle-cases, étuis, and especially plaques with portraits.—Canton enamel, a variety of surface-enamel in which the ground is usually plain white, yellow, or light blue, and is decorated with enamel paintings in many colors, representing conventional flowers, scrolls, etc. Vases, incense-burners, etc., are made of it, and it is one of the most successful of modern Chinese artistic industries.—Champlevé enamel. See def. 3, and champlevé.—Cloisonné enamel. See def. 3, and cloisonné.—Enamel à jour, a kind of enamel in which there is no background, the enamel being made to fill all the space between the narrow bars or wires which form the design. Such enamel when translucent shows as a pattern seen by transmitted light.—Enamel-column, the minute six-sided prisms of which the enamel of the teeth is composed. Also called enamel-prisms, enamel-rods, and enamel-fibers.—Enamel-cuticle, a thin horny cuticle covering the outer surface of the enamel in un worn teeth. Also called Nasmyth's membrane and cuticula dentis.—Enamel en basse taille, a variety of champlevé enamel in which the background of the lowered or sunken parts is sculptured with figures in relief, the enamel itself being transparent to allow them to be seen.—Enamel en taille d'épargne, a variety of champlevé enamel in which the field is almost wholly cut away or hollowed out for the reception of the enamel, leaving only narrow dividing lines of the metallic background.—Flocked enamel, enamel used for ornamenting a glass surface which has been made dull by grinding or by the use of acid.—Glass enamel, an opaque or semi-opaque glass having a milky appearance, due to the addition of binoxid of tin. It is used for window transparencies and "porcelain" lamp-shades.—Incrustrated enamel, disks or similar small flat pieces of enameled metal inlaid in a larger surface, as of chased metal or filigree.—Limoges enamel, a variety of surface-enamel produced especially at Limoges in France, in which vessels and decorative pieces of various kinds and sizes are ornamented with pictorial subjects painted in many colors and in gold. This work reached its greatest excellence at the time of the Renaissance.*

It is a vaulted apartment, . . . decorated with encaustic ornaments of the most brilliant colors. B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 123.

Encaustic painting. (a) The art of painting with wax as a vehicle: strictly applicable only to painting executed or finished by the agency of heat, but applied also to modern methods of painting in wax, in which the wax-colors are dissolved in a volatile oil and used in the ordinary way. In the hot process colored sticks of wax and resin are melted on a heated palette, applied with the brush, and afterward modeled and united with a heated iron and spatula. After the surface has become cool and hard, it is rubbed with a candle and gone over with a clean linen cloth. According to another method, tested by Count Caylus, the ground of cloth or wood is first rubbed over with a piece of beeswax, and afterward with chalk or whiting, in order to form a surface on which the colors will adhere. The colors are mixed simply with water, and are applied in the ordinary way. When the picture is dry, it is heated, and the wax softens and absorbs the colors, forming a firm and durable coating. Encaustic painting was in very common use among the ancient Greeks and Romans: Paintings executed in encaustic occupy, in color and general effect, a place midway between paintings in oil and in fresco. (b) In ceram., an arbitrary name given by Josiah Wedgwood to his attempted imitation of the painted decoration of Greek vases, the effort being to produce fired colors without the gloss of enamel.—Encaustic tile, a tile for pavement- and wall-decoration, in which the pattern is inlaid or incrustated in clay of one color in a ground of clay of another color. The manufacture and employment of encaustic tiles were brought to great excellence in connection with the architecture of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, particularly in France and England; and the art has been successfully revived in the nineteenth century. The name is an arbitrary one, without relation to the process of manufacture.—Encaustic vase, a vase painted with the so-called encaustic colors of Wedgwood ware. See encaustic painting (b).

II. n. [< L. encaustica, < Gr. ἐγκαυστική. See I.] The art, method, or practice of encaustic painting.

enchace¹, v. t. See *enchase*¹.
enchace², v. t. An obsolete spelling of *enchase*². enchafet (en-chāf'), v. [< ME. enchāufen, < en + chāufen, chafe, as if ult. < L. incalfacere, make warm or hot: see en-1 and chafe.] I. trans. 1. To make warm or hot; heat.

Ever the gretter merite shal he have that most re-streyneth the wikkede enchāufing or ardure of this sinne.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

So in the body of man, when the blood is moved, it invadeth the vital and spiritual vessels, and being set on fire, it enchafeth the whole body.
Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 694.

2. To chafe or fret; provoke; enrage; irritate.
And yet as rough,
Their royal blood enchaf'd, as the roud'st wind,
That by the top doth take the mountain pine
And make him stoop to the vale.
Shak., Cymbeline, iv. 2.

Seizes the rough, enchafed northern deep.
J. Baillie.

II. intrans. To become warm.

As thei enchāufe, thei shul be losid fro ther place.
Wyclif, Job vi. 17 (Oxf.).

enchain (en-chān'), v. t. [Formerly also in-chain; < OF. enchaîner, F. enchaîner = Pr. Sp. encadenar = Pg. encadear = It. incatenare, < ML. incatenare, enchain, < L. in, in, + catenare (> OF. chainer, F. chaîner, etc.), chain: see en-1 and chain.] 1. To chain; fasten with a chain; bind or hold in or as if in chains; hold in bondage; enthrall. [Obsolete in the literal use.]

In times past the Tyrians . . . enchained the images of their Gods to their shrines, for fear they would abandon their city and be gone.
Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 712.

What should I do? while here I was enchain'd,
No glimpse of godlike liberty remain'd.
Dryden, Æneid.

2. To hold fast; restrain; confine: as, to en-chain the attention.

The subtlety of nature and operations will not be in-chained in those bonds.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 215.

It was the Time when silent Night began
T' enchain with Sleep the busie Spirits of Man.
Conley, Davidels, i.

3. To link together; connect. [Rare.]
One contracts and enchains his words.
Howell.

enchainment (en-chān'ment), n. [< F. enchaînement = Pr. encademèn = Sp. encadenamiento = Pg. encadeamento = It. incatenamento, < ML. incatenamentum*, < incatenare, enchain: see enchain and -ment.] 1. The act of enchain-ing, or the state of being enchained; a fasten-ing or binding; bondage.

It is quite another question what was the time and what were the circumstances which, by an enchainment as of fate, brought on the period of crime and horror which before the war with England had already coloured the advancing stages of the Revolution [in France].
Gladstone, Nineteenth Century, XXI. 923.

2. A linking together; concatenation. [Rare.]
And we shall see such a connection and enchainment of one fact to another, throughout the whole, as will force the most backward to confess that the hand of God was of a truth in this wonderful defeat.
Warburton, Julian's Attempt to Rebuild the Temple, ii. 3.

The idea of a systematic enchainment of phenomena, in which each is conditioned by every other, and none can be taken in isolation and explained apart from the rest, was foreign to his [Epicurus's] mind.
Encyc. Brit., VIII. 475.

enchair (en-chār'), v. t. [< en-1 + chair.] To seat or place in a chair; place in a position of authority or eminence. [Rare.]

But thou, Sir Lancelot, sitting in my place
Enchair'd to-morrow, arbitrate the field.
Tennyson, Last Tournament.

enchant (en-chānt'), v. t. [Formerly also in-chant; < ME. enchaunten, < OF. enchanter, enchanter, F. enchanter = Pr. encantar, enchantar = Sp. Pg. encantar = It. incantare, < L. incantare, bewitch, enchant, say over, mutter or chant a magic formula, < in, in, on, + cantare, sing, chant: see chant and incantation.] 1. To practise sorcery or witchcraft on; subdue by charms or spells; hold as by a spell; bewitch.

By the Witchcraft of fair Words, [Rowena] so enchanted the British Nobility that her Husband Vortigern was again established in the Kingdom.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 4.

John thinks them all enchanted; he inquires if Nick had not given them some intoxicating potion.
Arbutnot.

2. To impart a magical quality or effect to; change the nature of by incantation or sorcery; bewitch, as a thing.

And now about the caldron sing,
Like elves and fairies in a ring,
Enchanting all that you put in.
Shak., Macbeth, iv. 1.

3. To delight in a high degree; charm; fascinate.

Bid me discourse; I will enchant thine ear.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 145.
The prospect such as might enchant despair.
Couper, Retirement, l. 469.

= Syn. 3. Enchant, Charm, Fascinate, captivate, enrapture, carry away. To fascinate is to bring under a spell, as by the power of the eye; to enchant and to charm are to bring under a spell by some more subtle and mysterious power. This difference in the literal affects also the figurative senses. Enchant is stronger than charm. All generally imply a pleased state in that which is affected, but fascinate less often than the others.

So stands the statue that enchants the world.
Thomson, Summer, l. 1346.
The books that charmed us in youth recall the delight ever afterwards.
Alcott, Table-Talk, i.

Many a man is fascinated by the artifices of composition, who fancies that it is the subject which had operated so potentially.
De Quincey, Style, i.

She sat under Mrs. Mackenzie as a bird before a boaconstrictor, doomed—fluttering—fascinated.
Thackeray, Newcomes, lxxiii.

enchanter (en-chān'ter), n. [< ME. enchanter, enchaunter, enchauntour, < OF. enchanteor, enchanteur, F. enchanteur = Pr. encantaire, encantador = Sp. Pg. encantador = It. incantatore, < L. incantator, an enchanter, < incantare, charm, enchant: see enchant.] 1. One who enchants or practises enchantment; a sorcerer or magician.

Flatereres ben the develes enchauntours, for they maken a man to wenen himself be lyke that he is not lyke.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

Than Pharo called for the wyse men and enchaunters of Egypt; and they did in lyke manner with their sorcery.
Bible (1551), Ex. vii.

2. One who charms or delights.—Enchanter's nightshade, a name of the common species of the genus Civcæa, natural order Onagraceæ, low and slender erect herbs with small white flowers, inhabiting cool, damp woods of the northern hemisphere.

enchanting (en-chān'ting), p. a. Charming; ravishing; delightful to mind or sense: as, an enchanting voice; an enchanting face.

Simplicity in . . . manners has an enchanting effect.
Kames, Elem. of Criticism, iii.

The mountains rise one behind the other, in an enchanting gradation of distances and of melting blues and grays.
H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 242.

enchantingly (en-chān'ting-li), adv. In an enchanting manner; so as to delight or charm.

Yet he's gentle; never schooled, and yet learned; full of noble device; of all sorts enchantingly beloved.
Shak., As you Like it, i. 2.

enchantment (en-chān'tment), n. [< ME. enchantment, enchaument, < OF. enchantment, enchantment, F. enchantment = Pr. encantamen = Cat. encantament = Sp. encantamento, encantamiento = Pg. encantamento = It. incantamento, < L. incantamentum, a charm, incantation, < incantare, charm, enchant: see enchant.] 1. The pretended art or act of producing effects by the invocation or aid of demons or the agency of spirits; the use of magic arts, spells, or charms; incantation; that which produces magical results.

A noon as thei were a-bedde, Merlin began an enchantment, and made hem to slepe alle.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 609.

The magicians of Egypt, they also did in like manner with their enchantments.
Ex. vii. 11.

She is a witch, sure,
And works upon him with some damu'd enchantment.
Fletcher (and another), False One, iii. 2.

2. The state or condition of being enchanted, literally or figuratively; especially, a very delightful influence or effect; a sense of charm or fascination.

Warmth of fancy—which holds the heart of a reader under the strongest enchantment.
Pope, Pref. to Iliad.

3. That which enchants or delights; the power or quality of producing an enchanting effect.

As we grow old, many of our senses grow dull, but the sense of beauty becomes a more perfect enchantment every year.
J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 187.

= Syn. 1. Charm, fascination, magic, spell, sorcery, necromancy, witchery, witchcraft.—2. Rapture, transport, ravishment.

enchantress (en-chān'tres), n. [< ME. enchauteresse, < OF. enchauteresse*, F. enchauteresse = It. incantatrice, < LL. incantatrix*, fem. of incantator, an enchanter: see enchant-er.] A woman who enchants, as by magic spells, beauty, manner, or the like; a sorceress.

From this enchantress all these ills are come.
Dryden.

enchantry, n. [ME. enchantery, enchaunterye, < OF. enchanterie, enchantment, < enchanter, enchant: see enchant.] Enchantment.

Tho the clerke hadde yseid hys enchaunterye, Ther fore Silu hym let sle.
Robert of Gloucester, p. 10.

encharge (en-chārj'), v. t. [< ME. enchargen, < OF. encharger, enchargier, encarchier, encarkier, etc., < ML. incariicare, load, charge, < L. in, in, + ML. caricare, caricare (> F. encharger = Pr. Sp. encargar = Pg. encargar = It. incariicare, < charger, etc.), charge, load: see en-1 and charge.] To give in charge or trust.

I have dispatched away Mr. Meredith, his Majesty's secretary of the embassy here, by the Catherine yacht, and encharged with my main packet to the secretary.

Sir W. Temple, To my Lord Treasurer, July 20, 1678.

His countenance would express the spirit and the passion of the part he was encharged with.
Jeffrey.

encharge (en-chārj'), n. [encharge, v.] An injunction; a charge.

A nobleman being to passe through a water, commanded his trumpet to goe before and sound the depth of it; who to shew himselfe very mannerly, refused this encharge, and pushed the nobleman himselfe forward, saying: 'No, sir, not I, your lordship shall pardon me.'

A. Copley, tr. of Wits, Fits, and Fancies (ed. 1614).

enchase¹, v. t. [< ME. enchāsen, enchacen, < OF. enchacier, enchacer, enchasser, encachier, encacier (= Pr. encassar), chase away, < en + chacier, chacer, chasser, chase: see en-1 and *chase*¹.] To drive or chase away.

After the comyng of this myghty kynge,
Oure olde woo and trouble to enchace.
Lydgate, (Halliwell.)

And ne we ne shull no helpe haue of hym that sholde hem alle enchace oute of this lond, that is the kynge Arthur.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 3938.

encheer (en-chēr'), v. t. [en-1 + *cheer*¹.] To enliven; cheer.

And in his soveraine throne gan straight dispose Himselfe, more full of grace and Majestic,
That mote encheare his friends, and foes mote terrifie.
Spenser, F. Q., VII. vi. 24.

enchelirion (en-kī'ri-on), n.; pl. encheliria (-iā). [Gr. ἐνχειρίον, < ἐν, in, + χείρ, a hand.] A handkerchief or napkin hanging from the zone or girdle, formerly worn as one of the vestments of the Greek clergy. It is regarded by some as the original form of the present epigonation.

Enchelia (en-kē'li-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐνχελία, an eel.] Ehrenberg's name (1830) of the group of infusorians now called Enchelyidae.

Enchelycephali (en-kel-i-sef'ā-lī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of enchelycephalus: see enchelycephalous.] A group of apodal teleostean fishes, containing the true eels and congers, as distinguished from the murenoids, etc., which form the group Colocephali. The technical characters are the absence of a preopercular arch and symplectic bone, in connection with a developed preoperculum and opercular bones. In Cope's system the group is an order of physostomous fishes; in Gill's, a suborder of Apodes.

enchelycephalous (en-kel-i-sef'ā-lus), a. [NL. enchelycephalus, < Gr. ἐνχελίος, an eel, + κεφαλή, head.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Enchelycephali.

Cf. encounter, n.] 1. A meeting, particularly a sudden or accidental meeting, of two or more persons or bodies of any kind; a coming together or in contact.

To shun th' encounter of the vulgar crowd. Pope.

Specifically—2. In physics, the coming within the sphere of one another's action of the rapidly moving molecules of a gaseous body. The word is so used by some writers in order to avoid collision, which might be understood to imply impact. The molecules of gases move in nearly rectilinear paths, until they come so close to one another that they are suddenly deflected. This very brief mutual action is the encounter. See gas.

When the distance between any two molecules is so small that they are capable of exerting sensible forces upon one another, there will be said to be an encounter between them.

H. W. Watson, Kinetic Theory of Gases, p. 27.

3. A meeting in opposition or conflict of any kind; a conflict; a battle; specifically, a contest between individuals or a small number of men, or an accidental meeting and fighting of detachments.

Full jolly knight he seemd, and faire did sitt,

As one for knightly giusts and fierce encounters fitt.

Spenser, F. Q., I. i. 1.

Leave this keen encounter of our wits.

Shak., Rich. III., I. 2.

Who ever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?

Milton, Areopagitica, p. 62.

4. Manner of encountering; mode of accost or address; behavior in intercourse.

Thus has he . . . only got the tune of the time, and outward habit of encounter.

Shak., Hamlet, v. 2.

=Syn. 3. Encounter, Recounter, Skirmish, Brush, collision, affair. As conflicts in war these are shorter, with fewer engaged, and of less importance, than those compared under battle. An encounter is often an accidental meeting, resulting in some conflict, but not suffered to grow into a general engagement. Recounter is the same thing, expressed by a term less common. A skirmish is an irregular or desultory contest between parts of armies, as scouting parties or skirmish-lines, not generally resulting in battle. A brush is short and sharp, perhaps engaging the whole of some force for a time, but not being pushed into a long or hard-fought struggle. See strife.

encounterer (en-koun'tér-ér), n. 1. One who encounters; an opponent; an antagonist.—2. One who goes to an encounter, or seeks encounters; one who is ready for encounter of any kind.

O, these encounterers, so glib of tongue,
That give a coasting welcome ere it comes,
And wide unclasp the table of their thoughts
To every tickling reader! Shak., T. and C., IV. 5.

encourage (en-kur'áj), v. t.; pret. and pp. encouraged, ppr. encouraging. [Formerly also incourage; < OF. encouragier, encoraigier, encourager, F. encourager (= Pr. encorajar = Sp. Pg. encorajar = It. incoraggiare, incoraggiare), < en, in, + courage, courage, heart: see courage, n. and v. Cf. ML. incordari, encourage, inspire, < L. in, in, + cor(-) = E. heart.] 1. To give courage to; inspire with courage, spirit, or firmness of mind; incite to action or perseverance.

But charge Joshua, and encourage him. Deut. III. 28.

King Richard, to encourage his Soldiers, made a solemn Speech to them. Baker, Chronicles, p. 233.

The actors behind the scene, who ascribed this pause to his natural timidity, attempted to encourage him.

Goldsmith, Vicar, xix.

2. To help forward; promote; give support to; as, to encourage manufactures.

The occupation dearest to his heart
Was to encourage goodness.

Cowper, Task, II. 709.

Whatever is meant by Christ's yoke being easy, Christ does not encourage sin.

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I. 101.

3t. To make stronger.

Erasmus had his Laguna or flagon of wine (recruited weekly from his friends at London), which he drank sometimes singly by itself, and sometimes encouraged his faint Ale with the mixture thereof.

Fuller, Hist. Cambridge, V. 48.

encouragement (en-kur'áj-mént), n. [Formerly also incouragement, incouragement; < OF. encouragement, encouragement, F. encouragement (= It. incoraggiamento, incoraggiamento), < encourager, encourager, encourage: see encourage and ment.] 1. The act of encouraging, or of giving courage or confidence of success; incitement to action or to perseverance; a promoting or advancing.

Somewhile with merry purpose, fit to please,
And otherwhile with good encouragement.

Spenser, F. Q., VI. v. 32.

For when he dies, farewell all honour, bounty,
All generous encouragement of arts. Otway, Orphan.

As a general rule, Providence seldom vouchsafes to mortals any more than just that degree of encouragement which suffices to keep them at a reasonably full exertion of their powers.

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, III.

2. That which serves to excite courage or confidence; an encouraging fact or circumstance; an incentive or inducement; that which serves to promote or advance.

What encouragement is there to venture an acquaintance with the rash and unstable?

Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xxiii.

To think of his paternal care
Is a most sweet encouragement to prayer.

Byron, On the Lord's Prayer.

encourager (en-kur'áj-ér), n. One who encourages, incites, or stimulates to action; one who promotes or advances.

He [Plato] would have women follow the camp, to be spectators and encouragers of noble actions.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 529.

The pope is a master of polite learning, and a great encourager of arts.

Addison.

The extraordinary collections made in every way by the late king [of Saxony], who was the greatest encourager of arts and sciences, and of every thing that is curious.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. II. 235.

encouragingly (en-kur'áj-ing-li), adv. In a manner to give courage or hope of success.

enocradle (en-kra'dl), v. t.; pret. and pp. enocradled, ppr. enocradling. [< en-1 + cradle.] To lay in a cradle.

Begins from first, where he enocradled was

In simple cratch, wrapt in a wad of hay.

Spenser, Hymn of Heavenly Love.

enocratic (en-kra'tik), a. [< Gr. ἐγκρατής, having power, possession, or control, self-controlling, < ἐν, in, + κράτος, power, strength, < κρατός, strong, hard, = E. hard.] Of or pertaining to self-control and self-denial, especially in the forms of continence and fasting or abstinence from animal food.

Enocratism (en'kra-tizm), n. [< enocrat-ic + -ism.] The principles of the Enocrates; especially, the doctrine that the union of the sexes is essentially evil.

Enocrate (en'kra-tit), n. [< LL. Enocratia, < Gr. ἐγκρατία, pl. of ἐγκρατής, lit. the self-disciplined, continent, < ἐγκρατής, self-disciplined, continent, being master, being in possession of power, < ἐν, in, + κράτος, power, strength.] In the early history of the church, especially among the Gnostics, one of those ascetics who refrained from marriage and from the use of flesh-meat and wine. They were members of various heretical sects, although sometimes spoken of as a distinct body founded by the apologist Tatian, of the second century. They were also called Continents.

It was the heresy of the Gnostics, that it was no matter how men lived, so they did but believe aright: which wicked doctrine Tatianus, a learned Christian, did so detest, that he fell into a quite contrary, . . . and thence came the sect Enocrates.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 312.

enocraty (en'kra-ti), n. [< Gr. ἐγκρατεία, mastery, control, self-control, < ἐγκρατής, having power, possession, or control: see enocratic.] Mastery over the senses; abstinence from pleasures of sense; self-control, as exercised in fasting and continence, especially the latter.

The martyrs at Lyons, as we have seen, and it may be said the School of S. John in general, were distinguished by a noble moderation: by enocraty, or temperance, in the truest sense of the word. Mahan, Church History, p. 161.

encrease, v. An obsolete form of increase.

encrest, n. An obsolete variant of increase.

Chaucer.

encrestet, v. An obsolete form of increase.

Not doubting but, if the same may be continued amonges them, they shall so thereby be encrestet in welth, that they wold not gladly be pulled therefro.

State Papers, III. 269.

encrimson (en-krim'zn), v. t. [< en-1 + crimson.] To make crimson; redden.

Look here what tributes wounded fancies sent me,
Of paled pearls, and rubies red as blood;

Figuring that they their passions likewise lent me,
Of grief and blushes, aptly understood

In bloodless white and the encrimson'd mood.

Shak., Lover's Complaint, I. 201.

encrinal (en'kri-nál), a. [< encrin(ite) + -al.] Pertaining to an encrinite or encrinites; relating to or containing fossil crinoids; belonging to extinct forms of the order Crinoidea (which see).

encrinic (en-kri-n'ik), a. [< encrin(ite) + -ic.] Same as encrinal.

Encrinidae (en-kri-ni-dé), n. pl. [NL, < Encrinus + -idae.] The former name of a family of crinoids which contained the permanently stalked forms, rooted during life. Nearly all the fossil forms, the stone-lilies or encrinites, are of this character. But the family was also represented by several living genera, or sea-lilies, as distinguished from the free feather-stars. It is now divided into numerous families. As now used by some authors, the family is restricted to fistulatus crinoids with a dicyclic base, basal plates with well-developed axial canal, brachials of two pieces, and generally without anal plates. They lived chiefly in the Triassic seas. See Crinoidea.

Encrinite: head and piece of stem on the left.

a, a, parts of the stem; b, b, separate joints.

(see crinoid), + -ites, E. *-ite*².] Any fossil crinoid; a stone-lily: a term especially applied to the ordinary stalked form with a cylindrical stem and well-formed arms. Encrinites compose vast strata of marble in northern Europe and North America. In fig. 2 the variety in the figures of the encrinites is caused by the different sections represented. See Crinoidea. (The words associated with encrinite are now archaic in zoology. In composition encrinite (NL encrinites) is generally represented by its radical element (Gr. κρινον), giving two parallel series of generic words ending in -crinus and -crinites.)

Piece of Derbyshire Marble, showing Encrinites.

Encrinites (en-kri-ni'téz), n. [NL.] The prior form of Encrinus. encrinitic, encrinitical (en-kri-ni'tik, -i-kál), a. [< encrinite + -ic, -ical.] Same as encrinal.

Encrinoidae (en-kri-noi'dé-ä), n. pl. [NL.] A group of crinoids. See Crinoidea.

Encrinuridae (en-kri-nū'ri-dé), n. pl. [NL, < Encrinurus + -idae.] A family of Silurian trilobites.

Encrinurus (en-kri-nū'rus), n. [NL, < Gr. ἐν, in, + κρινον, lily (see encrinite), + οὐρά, tail.] The typical genus of the family Encrinuridae.

Encrinus (en'kri-nus), n. [NL. (Lamarek, 1816), < Gr. ἐν, in, + κρινον, lily: see encrinite.] The name-giving genus of crinoids of the family Encrinidae, formerly of wide extent, but now restricted to a few closely related species. Also Encrinites.

encrisped (en-krispt'), a. [*< ME. encrisped; pp. of encrisp, v., < en-1 + crisp.] Curled; formed in curls. [Rare.]

Thai shall have softe encrisped wolle [wool]

And wonderly prolonged after the fülle.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 154.

With heris [hairs] encrisped, yallowe as the golde.

Skelton, Garland of Laurel, I. 289.

encroach (en-kroch'), v. [Formerly also incroach; < ME. encrochen, < OF. encrochier, encrocher, encrocier, encroquer, encroquer (ML. incrocicare), seize upon, take, < en, in, + croc, a crook: see crook, and cf. accroach.] It trans. To seize; take; take possession of; get; obtain.

He encroches keenly by craft of armes
Countrese and castelles that to thy coroun langes.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), i. 1243.
Thay ar happen also that for her harme wepes,
For thay schal comfort encroche in kythes ful mony.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), iii. 18.

II. intrans. 1. To enter, intrude, or trespass upon the possessions, jurisdiction, rights, province, domain, or limits of some other person or thing; infringe upon or restrict another's right in any way; specifically, in law, to extend one's possession of land so as to transgress the boundary between it and the rightful possession or enjoyment of another or of the public: with on or upon before the object.
Exclude the encroaching cattle from thy ground.
Dryden.

Those who are gentle and uncomplaining, too candid to intrigue, too delicate to encroach, suffer much.
Marg. Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 61.

Among primitive men, individual conflicts for food pass into conflicts between herds, when, in pursuit of food, one encroaches on another's territory.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 448.

2. Figuratively, to intrude gradually; lay hold, as if by stealth or irresistible power: with on or upon before the object: as, old age is encroaching upon me.
Superstition, . . . a creeping and encroaching evil.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity.

And listened long to the sweet sounds that thrilled
The frosty air, till now the encroaching cold Recalled her to herself.
Bryant, Little People of the Snow.

=Syn. Trench upon, infringe upon, etc. (see trespass, v. i.); to invade, violate, creep upon.

encroacht (en-kroch'), n. [< encroach, v.] The act of encroaching; encroachment.

I cannot imagine that heretics who err fundamentally, and by consequence damnably, took the first rise, and began to set up with a fundamental error, but grew into it by insensible encroachments and gradual insinuations.
South, Works, IV. ix.

encroacher (en-kro'cher), n. One who encroaches; one who lessens or limits anything, as a right or privilege, by narrowing its boundaries.
Sir John Mason, Treasurer of the Queen's Chamber, a grave and Learned Man, but a great Usurper and Encroacher upon Ecclesiastical Livings.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 337.

The bold encroachers on the deep Gain by degrees huge tracts of land.
Swift, Upon the Bankers, 1790.

encroachingly (en-kro'ching-li), adv. By encroachment.
encroachment (en-kroch'ment), n. [< OF. (AF.) encroachment, < encrochier, encroach: see encroach and -ment.] 1. The act of encroaching or intruding or trespassing; an entering on the rights or possessions of another, and taking possession; unlawful intrusion in general; assumption of the rights and privileges of another.

It is the surest policy in princes
To govern well their own than seek encroachment Upon another's right.
Ford, Perkin Warbeck, iii. 4.

But ambitious encroachments of the federal government on the authority of the state governments would not excite the opposition of a single state, or of a few states only.
Madison, The Federalist, No. xlv.

It will be seen that the system which effectually secured our liberties against the encroachments of kingly power gave birth to a new class of abuses from which absolute monarchies are exempt.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., i.

2. The thing taken by encroaching.
The general rule is that if the wrongful act is acquiesced in, the encroachment (i. e., the land added) is considered as annexed to the original holding.
Rapelye and Lawrence.

3. Figuratively, the act of intruding gradually and as if by stealth; approach, seizure, or progress: as, the encroachments of disease.

encrown, v. t. [ME. encrownen, < OF. encoroner, < en- + coroner, coroner, couronner, crown: see en-1 and crown.] To crown.
This lawe of armys was founded on the IX order of angellys in heven encrownyd with precyous stonys of colour and of vertes dyvers. Also of theym are igturyed the colours in armys.
Quoted in Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 103.

encrownment, n. [ME. encorowment, < OF. encoronnement, < encoroner, crown: see encrown and -ment.] Coronation.
Kepede fore encorowmentes of kynges enoyntede.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), i. 4198.

encrust, encrustation, v. t. See incrust, etc.
encrystal (en-kris'tal), v. t. [Formerly also enchristal; < en-1 + crystal.] To inclose in crystal; surround with or bury in ice.

We hear of some enchristal'd, such as have
That, which produc'd their death, become their grave.
Cartwright, On the Great Frost.

encuirass (en-kwé-rast' or en-kwé-rast'), a. [< en-1 + cuirass + -ed2.] In 1800., furnished with a structure or outer coat likened to a cuirass, such as is developed by certain infusorians; loricate.

encumber, incumber (en-, in-kum'bér), v. t. [*< ME. encumbren, encumbren, < OF. encumber, encumbere (= Pr. encumbrar = It. ingombrare), < en- + combrer, cumber: see en-1 and cumber.] 1. To clog or impede with a load, burden, or other hindrance; render difficult or laborious in motion or operation; embarrass; overload; perplex; obstruct.
Into the bestes throte he shal hem caste,
To sleke hys hunger, and encembre hys teth.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2066.

Encembre neuere thy conscience for couteysse of Mede [gain].
Piers Plowman (C), iii. 51.
Though laden, not encumber'd with her spoil.
Cowper, Tirocinium, l. 17.

Knowledge, . . .
Till smooth'd, and squar'd, and fitted to its place,
Does but encumber whom it seems to enrich.
Cowper, Task, vi. 95.

Specifically—2. To place (property) under a charge or servitude; load with debt or liability: as, to encumber an estate with mortgages, or with a widow's dower; an encumbered title. See encumbrance, 3.=Syn. 1. To oppress, overload, hinder, entangle, handicap, weigh down.

encumber, n. [< ME. encumber, < OF. encombre, < encumber, v., encumber: see encumber, v.] An encumbrance; a hindrance.
Thei spede her journeyes that thei com to the Castell of Charroye with-outte eny encumber, and ther thei made of the kynge Bohors grete ioye.
Mertin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 358.

encumberingly, incumberingly (en-, in-kum'-ber-ing-li), adv. In a manner to encumber or impede.
encumberment, n. [= F. encombrement = Pr. encumbrament = It. ingombramento; as encumber + -ment.] The act of encumbering; obstruction; interference.
Into the se of Spayn [they] wer dryuen in a torment
Among the Sarazins, bot God, that grace than lent, Sauded tham alle tho tymes fro ther encumberment.
Rob. of Brunne, tr. of Langtut's Chron., p. 148.

The best aduizement was, of bad, to let her Sleepe out her fill without encumberment.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. viii. 38.

encumbrance, incumbrance (en-, in-kum'-brans), n. [< ME. encumbrance, encombrance, < OF. encombrance, < encumber, encumber: see encumber.] 1. The act of encumbering, or the state of being encumbered.
Ther-fore, wyte ye well that this is the encombrance of the deuill.
Mertin (E. E. T. S.), i. 5.

2. That which encumbers, burdens, or clogs; anything that impedes action, or renders it difficult and laborious; an obstruction or impediment; an embarrassment.
Let none thinke they incourted not with all manner of incumbrances. Capt. John Smith, True Travels, II. 214.
Strip from the branching Alps their piny load,
The huge encumbrance of horritic wood. Thomson.

Specifically—3. In law, a charge or servitude affecting property, which diminishes the value of ownership, or may impair its enjoyment, so as to constitute a qualification or diminution of the rights of ownership. It does not impair ownership or power to convey, but implies a burden which will continue on the property in the hands of the purchaser. If a person owns only an undivided share in land, the share of his cotenant is not designated an encumbrance on his share; but if the land is subject to unpaid taxes or to a right of way, or if the land or one's share is subject to a mortgage or a mechanic's lien, it is said to be encumbered.

4. A family charge or care; especially, a child or a family of children: as, a widow without encumbrance or encumbrances. [Colloq.]—Covenant against encumbrances, a covenant, sometimes inserted in conveyances of land, that there are no encumbrances except such as may be specified.—Mesne encumbrances. See mesne.—Syn. 2. Burden, check, hindrance, drag, weight, dead weight.

encumbrancer, incumbrancer (en-, in-kum'-bran-sér), n. One who holds an encumbrance or a legal claim on an estate.

encumbrous, a. [ME. encombrous, encomberous, < OF. encombrs, encombrous, encombrus, < encombre, n., encumber: see encumber, n.] Cumbrous; tedious; embarrassing; burdensome.

Ful encomberous is the usynge.
Chaucer, Complaint of Venus, l. 42.
What help shall he
Whos sleves encombrous so syde trayle
Do to his lorde?
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 107.

To avoid many encumbrous arguments, which wit can devise against the truth, I send to your grace the copy of mine answer.
Strype, Cranmer, ii. 3, note.

encurtain (en-kér-tân), v. t. [ME. encurtynen, encorteynen, < OF. encortiner, encourtnier, < en- + cortiner, curtain: see en-1 and curtain.] To curtain; inclose with curtains.
And all within in preyly place
A softe bedde of large space
Thei hadde made, and encorteyned [var. encurtyned].
Gower, Conf. Amant, I.

ency., encyc. Abbreviations of encyclopedia.
encyclic, encyclical (en-sik'lik, -li-kal), a. and n. [= F. encyclique = Sp. enciclico = Pg. enciclico = It. enciclico, < NL. encyclicus (after L. cyclicus: see cyclic), equiv. to L. encyclicus, < Gr. ἐγκύκλιος, rounded, circular, periodic, general, < ἐν, in, + κύκλος, a circle.] I. a. 1. Circular; sent to all members of some circle or class. In the early church letters sent by members of a council to all the churches, or by bishops to churches of a particular diocese, were called encyclic letters. The term is now by the Roman Catholic Church exclusively applied to letters on topics of interest to the whole church, addressed by the Pope to all the bishops in communion with him.

An imperial encyclic letter branded with an anathema the whole proceedings at Chalcedon, and the letter of Pope Leo, as tainted with Nestorianism.
Milman, Latin Christianity, iii. 1.

The Encyclic Epistle commences with the duty of preserving the faith pure and undefiled as it was at first.
J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, i. 1194.

2. In bot., isomerous, with regular alternation of parts: applied to flowers in which the petals, stamens, etc., are equal in number in each whorl, alternating with each other.
If all the whorls have an equal number of parts and are alternate, it [a flower] is encyclic. Encyc. Brit., IV. 127.

II. n. A circular letter.
He [Leo XIII.] teaches by encyclicals; his predecessor taught by allocutions.
The Century, XXXVI. 90.

encyclopedia, encyclopædia (en-si-klō-pē'di-ā), n. [Formerly also encyclopedie, encyclopedie, encyclopedy, < F. encyclopédie = Sp. enciclopedia = Pg. enciclopedia = It. enciclopedia, < NL. encyclopædia, < Gr. ἐγκυκλοπαιδεία (a rare and barbarous form found in L. authors), prop. ἐγκύκλιος παιδεία, the circle of arts and sciences, the general education preceding professional studies: ἐγκύκλιος, in a circle, circular, periodic, general (see encyclic); παιδεία, education, < παιδευειν, educate, bring up a child, < παῖς (paid-), child: see pedagogue.] 1. The circle of sciences; a general system of instruction in several or all departments of knowledge. [Archaic.]

And therefore, in this encyclopedie and round of knowledge like the great and exemplary wheels of heaven, we must observe two circles.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., To the Reader.

Some by this art have become universally learned in a far larger compass than the old reputed encyclopedy.
Boyle, Works, VI. 335.

To Systematic Theology belongs also formal Encyclopædia, or an exhibition of theology as an organic whole, showing the relationship of the different parts, and their proper function and aim.
Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 5.

Specifically—2. A work in which the various topics included under several or all branches of knowledge are treated separately, and usually in alphabetical order.
It [a public library] should be rich in books of reference, in encyclopedias, where one may learn without cost of research what things are generally known. For it is far more useful to know these than to know those that are not generally known.
Lowell, Books and Libraries.

3. In a narrower sense, a cylopedia. See cylopedia, 1.
Abbreviated enc., ency., encyc.

French Encyclopædia (Encyclopédie ou Dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, etc.), a celebrated French work in 28 folio volumes (including 11 volumes of plates), the first of which appeared in 1751 and the last in 1765. Five volumes of supplements were issued in 1776-7, and two volumes of index in 1780, the complete work thus consisting of 35 volumes folio. The chief editor was Diderot, who was assisted by D'Alembert, and many of the great contemporary literary men of France (hence called the encyclopedists) contributed to it. From the skeptical character of many of the articles, the work excited the bitterest ecclesiastical enmity, and had no small part in bringing about the state of public opinion which prepared the way for the French revolution.

encyclopediacal (en-si'klō-pē-dī-ā-kal), a. Same as encyclopedic. [Rare.] encyclopedian (en-si-klō-pē-dī-an), a. and n. I. a. Same as encyclopedic. [Rare.]

II. n. The circle of sciences or knowledge; the round of learning.
Let them have that encyclopedian, all the learning in the world, they must keep it to themselves.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 191.

encyclopedic, encyclopædic (en-si-klō-pē'dik or -pē'dik), a. [= F. encyclopédique = Sp. enciclopédico = Pg. enciclopédico = It. enciclopédico, < NL. encyclopædia: see encyclopædia.] 1.

Ans. Man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever. The Shorter Catechism, ques. 1.

Secondary or succedaneous end, some additional object to be attained.—Subjective or relative end, that to which some particular impulse tends.—Subordinate end, that which is aimed at as a means to some further end.—The better end (ant.), the inner and little-used end, as of a cable. Bartlett.

We rode with two anchors ahead, and the cables veered out to the better end. Defoe, Robinson Crusoe.

The ends of the earth, in Script., the remotest parts of the earth, or the inhabitants of those parts. Deut. xxiii. 17; Ps. xlviii. 3.—To burn the candle at both ends, See candle.—To drink off candles' ends!, See candle.—To get the better end of, (a) To get the better of. Davies.

By all which it should seem we have rather cheated the devil than he us, and have gotten the better end of him. Bp. Sanderson, Works, I. 183.

(b) To get the better part of; have the advantage in: as, to get the better end of a bargain.—To give one a rope's end, to give one a beating with the end of a rope.—To have (something) at one's fingers' ends, to have it at command; be ready to impart it; be thoroughly posted in it.

Ay, sir, I have them [jest] at my fingers' ends. Shak., T. N., I. 3.

To make an end, (a) To finish; come to a stop; do no more: used absolutely, or with of before the thing concerned.

Believe 't, my lord and I have made an end; I have no more to reckon, he to spend. Shak., T. of A., iii. 4.

endexoteric (en-dek-sō-ter'ik), a. [Gr. ἐν, within, + εξωτερός, outside: see exoteric.] In med., resulting from internal and external causes simultaneously; including both esoteric and exoteric agency.

endiable, v. t. [F. endiable = Pr. Sp. endiablar = Pg. endiablar = It. indivolare, possess with a devil, < L. in, in, + LL. diabolus (< F. diable, etc.), devil: see devil.] To possess with or as if with a devil. Davies. [Rare.]

Such an one as might best endiable the rabble, and set them a bawling against popery.
Roger North, Examen, p. 571.

endiament, n. [< endi- + -ment.] Diabolical possession. Davies. [Rare.]

There was a terrible rage of faces made at him, as if an endiament had possessed them all.
Roger North, Examen, p. 608.

endiaper (en-di'ā-pēr), v. t. [< en-1 + diaper.] To decorate with or as with a diaper pattern; variegate.

Who views the troubled bosome of the maine
Endiaped with cole-blacke porpises.
Claudianus Tiberius Nero, sig. G, 2.

endict, endictment, etc. Obsolete forms of indict, etc.

ending (en'ding), n. [< ME. ending, -yng, -ung, < AS. endung, verbal n. of endian, end: see end, v.] 1. The act of bringing or coming to an end; termination, as of life; conclusion.

The king is not bound to answer the particular endings of his soldiers, the father of his son, nor the master of his servant; for they purpose not their death when they purpose their services.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 1.

Much adoe is made about the beginning and ending of Daniels weekes.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 356.

2. In gram., the terminating syllable or letter of a word; the termination, whether of declension, of conjugation, or of derivation.

ending-day, n. [ME. endyng-day. Cf. end-day.] The day of death.

To myn endyng-day. Chaucer, Complaint of Venus, l. 55.

endirkt, v. t. Same as endark.

end-iron (end'ī-ern), n. [< end + iron. In the second sense confused with andiron.] 1. One of two movable iron cheeks or plates used in cooking-stoves to enlarge or contract the grate at pleasure.—2. One of two short, thick bars of iron used to hold the ends of the sticks in a wood-fire built on a hearth. The end-irons are generally movable, and can be brought more or less near at will. They differ from fire-dogs or andirons in lying flat upon the hearth. They are much used in the south of Europe.

endirore, n. An obsolete form of andiron.

endit'er (en-di'tēr), v. t. An obsolete form of indite.

endit'er (en-di'tēr), n. An obsolete form of inditer.

endive (en'div), n. [*< ME. endyve = D. andjive = G. Dan. endivie = Sw. endivia, < OF. endive, F. endive = Sp. endibia, formerly endivia = Pr. Pg. It. endivia, < ML. intibia, fem. sing., L. intibius, intubius, intubus, masc., intibum, intybum, neut., < Gr. ἐνδιβιον, endive. Cf. Ar. hindiba, appar. of European origin.] A plant, Cichorium Endivia, of the natural order Compositæ, distinguished from the chicory, C. Intybus, by its annual root, much longer unequal pappus, and less bitter taste. It is probably identical with C. pumilum, a wild species common throughout the Mediterranean region; but it has long been in cultivation, and is in common use as a salad.*

Endive, or succory, is of several sorts: as the white, the green, and the curled.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

endless (end'les), a. [< ME. endeles, < AS. endeleðs = OS. endilōs = D. endelōos = G. endlos = Dan. endelōs = Sw. ändelōs, < ende, end, + -less, -less.] 1. Not having a termination; continuing without end, really or apparently; having no limit or conclusion: as, endless progression; endless bliss; the endless pursuit of an object.

My sonne, God of his endeles goodness
Walled a tongue with teeth, and lippes eke,
For man sholde him avywe that he speke.
Chaucer, Manciple's Tale, l. 213.

Let endlesse Peace your steadfast hearts accord.
Spenser, Prothalamion, l. 102.

The endless islands which we have seen along the northern part of the Dalmatian shore, bare and uninhabited rocks as many of them are, are without history.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 190.

It is impossible to conceive a limit to the extent of matter in the universe; and therefore science points rather to an endless progress, through an endless space, of action involving the transformation of potential energy into palpable motion, and thence into heat, than to a single finite mechanism, running down like a clock, and stopping for ever. Thomson and Tait, Nat. Phil., I. ii, App. E.

2. Not having ends; returning upon itself so as to exhibit neither beginning nor end: as, an endless belt or chain; a circular race-course is endless.—3. Perpetually recurring; interminable; incessant; continual: as, endless praise; endless clamor.

If singing breath or echoing chord
To every hidden pang were given,
What endless melodies were poured,
As sad as earth, as sweet as heaven!
O. W. Holmes, The Voiceless.

4. Without object, purpose, or use.

Nothing was more endless than the common method of comparing eminent writers by an opposition of particular passages in them.
Pope, Pref. to Iliad.

5. Without profitable conclusion; fruitless.

All loves are endless. Beau. and Fl.

Endless belt, cable, chain, etc., one made without detached ends, or with its ends joined together, so as to pass continuously over two wheels at a greater or less distance from each other.—

Endless saw. Same as band-saw.—Endless screw, a mechanical arrangement consisting of a screw the thread of which gears into a wheel with skew teeth, the obliquity corresponding to the angle of pitch of the screw. It is generally used as a means of producing slow motion in the adjustments of machines, moving the valve-gear of marine engines by hand, etc., rather than for the transmission of any great amount of power. Also called perpetual screw.—Syn. 1. Eternal, everlasting, perpetual, unceasing, imperishable, uninterrupted, boundless, immeasurable, unlimited.

endlessly (end'les-li), adv. In an endless manner; without end or termination.

From glooming shadows of eternal night,
Shut up in darkness endlessly to dwell.
Drayton, Pierce Gaveston.

endlessness (end'les-nes), n. [< ME. endeleśnes, < AS. endeleśnes, < endeleðs, endless, + -nes, -ness.] The character of being endless; extension without end or limit; perpetuity; endless duration. Donne.

endlevert, endlevent, a. and n. Obsolete (Middle English) forms of eleven.

endlicheite (end'lik-it), n. [After Dr. F. M. Endlich.] An arsenic-vanadate of lead, intermediate between mimetite and vanadinite, found in New Mexico.

endlong (end'long), prep. and adv. [Early mod. E. also endelong and endalong (as if < end + long or along), < ME. endelonge, orig. along, < AS. andlang, > E. along: see along.] 1. prep. Along; lengthwise; from end to end of.

This lady rotheth . . . endelunge the stonde.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 1498.

And as they went endlande [read endlange] this reve, abowte the viijth house of the day they come tilte a castelle that stode in a litlelle ile in this forsaide ryvere.
MS. Lincoln, A. i. 17, fol. 27. (Halliwell.)

And so he went endelunge the Cloyster there we sat at ye table and dalt to every Pygryme as he passed a pap wt relyques of yhe holy place aboute Jherusalē.
Sir R. Guylforde, Pygrymage, p. 39.

Sir Cuthbert Ratcliff, with divers of the most wise borderers, devised a watch to be set from sunset to sunrise at all passages and fords endalong all the middle marches over against North Tynedale and Redesdale.
Hodgson, quoted in Ribton-Turner's Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 86.

II. adv. 1. Along; lengthwise.

The enemies . . . were within the towne by their trenches both endlong and oerthwart.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 89.

2. Continuously; from end to end.

So takes in hand
To seeke her endlong both by sea and lond.
Spenser, F. Q., III. x. 19.

endly, a. [=(MHG. endelich, endlich, G. endlich, final) < end + -ly.] Final.

An endly or final processe of peace by authoritie.
Hakluyt's Voyages, l. 206.

endly, adv. [< ME. endely = (MHG. endeliche, endliche, G. endlich), finally; < end + -ly.] Finally.

Pees shalle be whereas now trouble is,
After this lyfe endly in blys.
MS. Harl., 3869. (Halliwell.)

end-man (end'man), n. 1. A man at one end of a row or line; hence, an extremist; one who takes the most advanced view of anything.

A very long series of resolutions, expressing the sentiments of a few end men on most of the open questions in the broad sphere of modern life, were approved.
Science, IV. 113.

Specifically.—2. In minstrel-troupes, a man who sits at an end of the semicircle of performers during the opening part of the entertainment. In the early days of negro minstrelsy each troupe had two end-men, of whom one played the tambourine and the other the clappers, or bones, and both alternately cracked jokes with the middle-man and told funny stories after each song sung by one of the company. The larger troupes have since had two, and sometimes four, of each class of end-men.

endmost (end'mōst), a. superl. [< end + -most.] Situated at the very end; furthest.

endo- (en'dō). [< Gr. êndo-, combining form of êndon, in, within, in the house, at home (= OL. endo-, indu-, in comp., cf. intus, within), < êv = L. in = E. in.] A prefix in words of Greek origin, signifying 'within,' 'inside': equivalent to ento-: opposed to ecto- or exo-, and in some cases to apo-, epi-, and peri-.

Endless Screw and Wheel.

endoarian (en-dō-ā-ri-an), a. Having internal genitalia, as an actinozoan; or of pertaining to the Endoarii; not exoarian.

Endoarii (en-dō-ā-ri-i), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. êndon, within; + L. suffix -arius: see -ary.] Actinozoans: so named by Rapp (1829), with reference to their internal genitalia: distinguished from Exoarii.

endoarteriitis, endoarteritis (en'dō-ār'tē-ri-ī'tis, -ār-tē-ri-tis), n. [NL.] Same as endarteritis.

endobasidium (en'dō-bā-sid'i-um), n.; pl. endobasidia (-ia). [NL., < Gr. êndon, within; + NL. basidium.] In mycol., a basidium that is inclosed in a dehiscent or indehiscent conceptacle, as in Gasteromyces.

endoblast (en'dō-blāst), n. [< Gr. êndon, within; + βαστός, germ.] In biol., the internal blastema or substance of the endoderm: same as hypoblast.

endoblastic (en-dō-blas'tik), a. [< endoblast + -ic.] Pertaining to endoblast; constituting or consisting of endoblast; endodermal; hypoblastic.

endocardiac (en-dō-kār'di-ak), a. [< Gr. êndon, within; + καρδιά, = E. heart (see endocardium), + -ac. Cf. cardiac.] 1. Situated within the heart.—2. Relating to the endocardium, or to the interior of the heart: as, an endocardiac sound or murmur.—3. Situated in the cardiac portion of the stomach.

endocardial (en-dō-kār'di-āl), a. [< Gr. êndon, within; + καρδιά, = E. heart (see endocardium), + -al.] 1. Situated within the heart.—2. Pertaining to the endocardium.

Endocardines (en-dō-kār'di-nēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. êndon, within; + L. cardo (cardin-), a hinge: see cardo, cardinal.] A group of fossil (Cretaceous) lamellibranch mollusks, containing the Eudistia only, thus corresponding to the family Hippuritidae: opposed to Exocardines. They had an inner hinge, with teeth on one valve.

endocarditic (en'dō-kār'dit'ik), a. [< endocarditis + -ic.] Pertaining to endocarditis.

endocarditis (en'dō-kār'di'tis), n. [NL. (= F. endocardite), < endocardium + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the endocardium.

endocardium (en-dō-kār'di-um), n. [NL., < Gr. êndon, within; + καρδιά, = E. heart.] In anat., the lining of the heart, as distinguished from the pericardium, or investing membrane of that organ; the tissue forming the inner surface of the walls of the cardiac cavities, or this surface itself.

endocarp (en'dō-kārp), n. [= F. endocarpe, < NL. endocarpium, < Gr. êndon, within; + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., the inner wall of a pericarp which consists of two dissimilar layers. It may be hard and stony as in the plum and peach, membranous as in the apple, or fleshy as in the orange. The endocarp or stone, the epicarp or outer skin, and the mesocarp or fleshy part of a peach are shown in the cut.

Fruit of Peach (Amygdalus Persica). En, endocarp; Ep, epicarp; Mes, mesocarp.

Endocarpeae¹ (en-dō-kār'pē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Endocarpon (the typical genus) + -ae.] In bot., a family of angiocarpous lichens having a foliaceous thallus. Also Endocarpei.

Endocarpeae² (en-dō-kār'pē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. êndon, within; + καρπός, fruit, + -ae.] In zool., a division of nematophorous Cœlenterata, containing those whose genitalia develop from the endoderm: opposed to Ectocarpeae. The division contains the Scyphomedusæ, and also the Actinozoa proper or Anithozoa. Hertwig Brothers, 1879.

endocarpein (en-dō-kār'pē-in), a. [< Endocarpeae + -in.] Same as endocarpoid.

endocarpoid (en-dō-kār'poid), a. [< Endocarpeae + -oid.] In lichenology, having the apothecia sunken in the substance of the thallus, as in the genus Endocarpon.

Endocarpon (en-dō-kār'pon), n. [NL., < Gr. êndon, within; + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., the representative genus of Endocarpeae. It has the apothecia immersed in the thallus.

Endocephala (en-dō-sef'ā-lā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of endocephalus*: see endocephalous.] The headless mollusks: same as Acephala.

endocephalous (en-dō-sef'ā-lus), a. [*< NL. endocephalus, < Gr. êndon, within; + κεφαλή, the head.] Having the head, as it were, within; acephalous or headless, as a lamellibranch mollusk; pertaining to the Endocephala.

endoceratid (en-dō-ser'a-tid), n. A fossil cephalopod of the family Endoceratidae.

Endoceratidae (en-dō-se-rat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + κέρας (keras), horn, + -idae.] A family of nautiloid cephalopods having large holocoanoid siphons, endocones or sheaths, an endosiphon, and the whorls fusiform in transverse section. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., XXII, 266.

endocervical (en-dō-sér'vi-kal), a. [< Gr. ἐνδον, within, + Λ. cervix (cervix), neck, + -al.] Pertaining to the inside of the cervix of the uterus.

endocervicitis (en-dō-sér-vi-si'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + Λ. cervix (cervix), neck, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the lining of the cervix of the uterus.

endochona (en-dō-kō'nā), n.; pl. endochonae (-nē). [NL., < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + χώνη, a funnel: see chone.] An endochone: distinguished from ectochona. Sollas.

endochondral (en-dō-kon'dral), a. [< Gr. ἐνδον, within, + χόνδρος, cartilage, + -al.] Situated within a cartilage.

endochone (en-dō-kōn), n. [< NL. endochona.] The inner division of a chone. Sollas.

endochorion (en-dō-kō'ri-on), n.; pl. endochoria (-iā). [NL., < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + χόριον, a membrane, the chorion.] In anat., the inner chorion: a term sometimes applied to the vascular layer of the allantois, lining the chorion.

endochorionic (en-dō-kō-ri-on'ik), a. [< endochorion + -ic.] Pertaining to the endochorion.

endochroa (en-dok'rō-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + χρόα, χρῶα, surface.] In bot., a name given by Hartig to a supposed interior layer of the cuticle.

endochrome (en-dō-krōm), n. [< Gr. ἐνδον, within, + χρῶμα, color.] 1. In bot., the brown cell-contents in Diatomaceae, colored by diatomins. The term has also been applied generally to the coloring matter, other than green, of flowers, etc.—2. In zool., the highly colored endoplasm of a cell.—Endochrome plates, the colored portions of the cell-contents of diatoms.

endochyme (en-dō-kim), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + χυμός, juice: see chymel.] In zool., the inner chyme-mass; endoplasm.

endoclinal (en-dō-kli'nal), a. [< Gr. ἐνδον, within, + κλίνη, lean (see clinode), + -al.] In bot., having the clinode (hymenium) inclosed in a conceptacle.

endocelar (en-dō-sē'lār), a. [< Gr. ἐνδον, within, + κόλως, hollow, κόιλια, the belly, + -ar.] Situated on the inner wall, or intestinal surface or visceral side, of the celoma or body-cavity; splanchnopleural: used chiefly of bodies derived from a four-layered germ, and hence with reference to the splanchnopleural or visceral division of the mesoderm: opposed to exocelar.

The intestinal fibrous layer. From this is developed, firstly, the endocelar: that is, the inner or visceral celom epithelium, the layer of cells covering the outer surface of the whole intestine. Haeckel, Evol. (trans.), I, 271.

endocelarium (en-dō-sē-lā'ri-um), n. [NL., < see endocelar.] In zool., the layer of cells forming the epithelium of the visceral or inner wall of the body-cavity; the visceral epithelium of the celoma.

endocondyle (en-dō-kon'dil), n. Same as entocondyle.

endocone (en-dō-kōn), n. [< Gr. ἐνδον, within, + κῶνος, cone.] One of the internal concentric cones formed by the sheaths of the siphons of some cephalopods, as those of the family Endoceratidae. Hyatt.

endoconic (en-dō-kon'ik), a. [< endocone + -ic.] Pertaining to the endocone of a cephalopod.

endocranial (en-dō-kra'ni-al), a. [< endocranium + -al.] Pertaining to the endocranium; situated or taking place within the cranium.

endocranium (en-dō-kra'ni-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + κράνιον, the skull.] In zool., and anat., a collective name for the processes which project inward from the cranium of an animal, and serve to support the organs of the head: applied by Huxley to the hard pieces found in the head of an insect, and invisible without dissection. In the cockroach these form a cruciform partition in the middle of the head, and they assume various forms in other insects. Also called tentorium, and by Kirby cephalophragma.

There is [in the cockroach] a sort of internal skeleton (Endocranium or tentorium), which extends as a cruciform partition from the inner face of the lateral walls of the cranium . . . to the sides of the occipital foramen. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 343.

endocrinatete (en-dok'tri-nāt), v. t. See indocrinatete.

endocrine (en-dok'trin), v. t. [= F. endocriniser = Pr. endocriniser; as en-1 + doctrin.] Same as indocrinatete.

endocyclic (en-dō-sik'lik), a. [< NL. endocyclicus, < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + κύκλος, circle.] Having a centric anus, as a regular sea-urchin; specifically, pertaining to the Endocyclica. Also endocyclical.

Endocyclica (en-dō-sik'li-kā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of endocyclicus: see endocyclic.] An order of echinoderms, containing the regular or desmostichous sea-urchins, having the anus centric, as the cidarids and ordinary sea-eggs: same as Desmosticha: opposed to Exocyclica.

endocyclical (en-dō-sik'li-kal), a. Same as endocyclic.

endocyemate (en-dō-si'e-māt), a. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + κύημα, an embryo (< κύνειν, conceive), + -ate1.] In embryol., developed in the manner characteristic of reptiles, birds, and mammals, in which the embryo is bodily invaginated in an involution of the blastodermic membrane, and an amnion is developed in consequence; amniotic and allantoic, as vertebrates above batrachians: opposed to epicyemate.

The formation of the amnion in the endocyemate types of the Chordata. J. A. Ryder, Amer. Nat. (1886), p. 1118.

endocyesis (en-dō-si'e-sis), n.; pl. endocyeses (-sēs). [NL., < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + κύσις, conception, < κύνειν, conceive.] The state or quality of being endocyemate; the process by which an endocyemate embryo becomes such.

endocyst (en-dō-sist), n. [< Gr. ἐνδον, within, + κύστις, bladder: see cyst.] In zool.: (a) The inner layer or membrane of the body-wall of a polyzoön. If there is no ectocyst, the endoderm forms the entire integument. (b) In Polyzoa, the proper ectodermal layer of the organism inside the hard ectocyst, together with the parietal layer of the mesoderm which lines and secretes the cells of the exoskeleton. See cut under Plumatella.

endoderm (en-dō-dērm), n. [< Gr. ἐνδον, within, + δέρμα, skin.] In zool., the completed inner layer of cells in all metazoan animals, formed by the cells of the hypoblast or endoblast, and representing, under whatever modification, the lining of the enteron: opposed to ectoderm. Primatively, it is the wall of the gastrular body-cavity, as the ectoderm is of the whole body. Also entoderm. See cut under Hydrozoa.

The inner, or endoderm, is formed by the "invagination" of that layer into the space left void by the dissolution of the central cells of the "morula." W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 391.

endodermal (en-dō-dēr'mal), a. [< endoderm + -al.] Of or pertaining to the endoderm; constituting an endoderm; consisting of endoderm. Also endodermal, endodermic, entodermic.

endodermic (en-dō-dēr'mik), a. [< endoderm + -ic.] Same as endodermal.

endodermis (en-dō-dēr'mis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + δέρμα, skin.] In bot., the layer of modified parenchyma-cells which are united to form the sheath surrounding a fibrovascular bundle.

endenteritis (en-dō-en-tē-rī'tis), n. [NL.] Same as enteritis.

endogamous (en-dog'a-mus), a. [< endogamy + -ous.] Marrying, or pertaining to the custom of marrying, within the tribe or group; pertaining to, practising, or characterized by endogamy: opposed to exogamous.

These [the Roman usus and confarreatio] are . . . forms appropriate to marriages between members of the same family-group or tribe; and . . . could only have originated among endogamous tribes. McLennan, Prim. Marriage, iii.

The outer or endogamous limit, within which a man or woman must marry, has been mostly taken under the shelter of fashion or prejudice. It is but faintly traced in England, though not wholly obscured. Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 224.

endogamy (en-dog'a-mi), n. [< Gr. ἐνδον, within, + γάμος, marriage.] Marriage within the tribe: a custom among some savage peoples: opposed to exogamy.

The rule which declares the union of persons of the same blood to be incest has been hitherto unnamed. . . . The words endogamy and exogamy (for which botanical science affords parallels) appear to be well suited to express the ideas which stand in need of names, and so we have ventured to use them. McLennan, Prim. Marriage, iii, note.

Evidently endogamy, which at the outset must have characterized the more peaceful groups, and which has prevailed as societies have become less hostile, is a concomitant of the higher forms of the family. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 290.

endogastritis (en-dō-gas-tri'tis), n. [< Gr. ἐνδον, within, + γαστήρ, stomach, + -itis: see gastriitis.] In pathol., inflammation of the mucous membrane of the stomach; gastritis.

endogen (en-dō-jen), n. [< NL. endogenus, adj., < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + -γενος, producing: see -gen, -genous. Cf. the like-formed Gr. ἐνδογενής, born in the house.] A plant belonging to one of the large primary classes into which the vegetable kingdom is divided: so named from the belief that the fibrovascular bundles were developed only about the center of the stem, in distinction from the exogens or "outside growers"; a monocotyledon. In their structure the endogens differ from the exogens chiefly in the absence of a cambium layer and in the course of the vascular bundles, which, instead of being parallel to each other in successive concentric rings, have a variously oblique or curved direction, crossing each other, and forming a stem which has ordinarily no distinction of pith or bark, and in cross section shows the bundles irregularly disposed, either scattered over the whole surface or gathered more compactly toward the circumference. The other organs of the plants are also characteristic. The leaves are generally parallel-veined, the flowers usually have three organs in each whorl, the seed has an embryo with one cotyledon, and the radicle issues from a sheath and is never developed into a tap-root in germination. The endogens are divided into 34 natural orders, including about 1,500 genera and from 18,000 to 20,000 species. By the characters of the inflorescence they are also distinguished as either spadiceous, as in the Palmæ and Araceæ, petaloideous, as in the Orchidaceæ, Liliaceæ, Iridaceæ, and Amaryllidaceæ, or glumaceous, as in the Gramineæ and Cyperaceæ. These 8 orders embrace over four fifths of the whole number of species, the Orchidaceæ alone including nearly 5,000. This class contains many of the most valuable food-producing plants of the vegetable kingdom, such as the cereals and forage-plants among the grasses, the palms, plantains, etc.; and the petaloideous division supplies also very many of the most showy ornaments of the garden and greenhouse.

The structure of the roots of endogens and exogens is essentially the same in plan with that of their respective stems. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 375.

Endogenæ (en-doj'e-nē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. (sc. plantæ) of endogenus: see endogenous.] In bot., as a classifying name, the endogens. See monocotyledon.

endogenetic (en-dō-jē-net'ik), a. Having an origin from internal causes: as, endogenetic diseases. Dunglison.

endogenous (en-doj'e-nus), a. [< NL. endogenus: see endogen.] 1. In bot.: (a) Of or pertaining to the class of endogens; growing or proceeding from within: as, endogenous trees or plants; endogenous growth.

It is in the mode of arrangement of these bundles that the fundamental difference exists between the stems which are commonly designated as endogenous . . . and those which are more correctly termed exogenous. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 365.

(b) Originating within; internal; specifically, formed within another body, as spores within a sporangium.

The zygospore is strictly an endogenous formation. Bessey.

2. In anat.: (a) Same as autogenous. (b) Inclosed in a common cavity of the matrix, as cartilage-cells.—Endogenous cell-formation, the development of daughter-cells within the mother-cell.

endogenously (en-doj'e-nus-li), adv. In an endogenous manner; internally.

endognathal (en-dog'nā-thal), a. [< Gr. ἐνδον, within, + γάθος, jaw, + -al.] Of or pertaining to a modification of the three terminal joints of the gnathostegite or third thoracic appendage in brachyurous crustaceans. See gnathostegite.

The three terminal joints of the limb remain small, and constitute a palpiiform appendage—the endognathal palp. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 299.

endogonidium (en-dō-gō-nid'i-um), n.; pl. endogonidia (-iā). [NL., < Gr. ἐνδον, within, + NL. gonidium, q. v.] A gonidium (conidium) formed inside of a cell by free cell-formation, as in Saprolegnia, Mucor, Vaucheria, the yeast-plant, etc. These endogonidia being set free by the dissolution of the wall of the parent-cell soon enlarge and comport themselves as ordinary yeast-cells. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 311.

endogonium (en-dō-gō'ni-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + γόνος, seed.] In bot., the contents of the nucule of a chara. Treasury of Botany.

endolaryngeal (en'dō-lā-rin'jē-al), a. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + λάρυγξ, larynx, + -al.] Situated within the larynx.

endolymph (en'dō-limf), n. [= F. endolymph, < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + L. lymph, water: see lymph.] In anat., the peculiar limpid fluid which is contained within the membranous labyrinth of the ear, as distinguished from the perilymph, which surrounds it. Both are inside the bony labyrinth. The endolymph may contain hard bodies called otoconites. It is also known as the liquor Scarpa and the vitreous humor of the ear.

endolymphangial (en'dō-lim-fan'ji-al), a. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + L. lymph, water (see lymph), + Gr. αγγεῖον, a vessel, + -al.] Situated or contained in lymphatic vessels: an epithet applied to certain nodules in serous membrane in relation with the lymphatic system: opposed to perilymphangial: as, endolymphangial nodules.

endolymphatic (en'dō-lim-fat'ik), a. [< endolymph + -atic.] Pertaining to the endolymph, or to the cavity of the labyrinth which contains that fluid; endolymphic: as, the endolymphatic fluid (that is, the endolymph); the endolymphatic duct (which persists in some vertebrates, as sharks, as a communication between the labyrinth and the exterior). See ductus.

endolymphic (en'dō-lim'fik), a. [< endolymph + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or of the nature of endolymph.

She [Laura Bridgman] does not appear to be in the least ataxic; but it will be remarkable if touch and muscle-sense have . . . so well learned to discharge those [functions] now generally supposed to be due to endolymphic pressure. G. S. Hall, German Culture, p. 262.

endomaget, v. t. An obsolete form of endamage.
endome (en-dōm'), v. t. pret. and pp. endomed, ppr. endoming. [< en- + dome.] To cover with or as if with a dome.

The blue Tuscan sky endomes
Our English words of prayer.
Mrs. Browning, Child's Grave at Florence.

endomersion (en-dō-mēr'shon), n. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + LL. (gloss.) mersio (n-), a dipping in, immersion, < L. mergere, dip: see merge.] Immersion: a word used only in the phrase endomersion objective (which see, under objective, n.).

endometrial (en-dō-mē'tri-al), a. [< endometrium + -al.] 1. Situated within the uterus. — 2. Pertaining to the endometrium.

endometritis (en'dō-mē'trit'is), n. [NL., < endometrium + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the endometrium.

endometrium (en-dō-mē'tri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + μήτρα, uterus: see matrix.] The lining membrane of the uterus.

endomorph (en'dō-mōrf), n. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + μορφή, form.] In mineral., a mineral inclosed in a crystal of another mineral. Thus there are found in quartz crystals a great variety of minerals, as rutile, tremolite, tourmaline, hematite, etc.

endomorph (en'dō-mōrf'ik), a. [< endomorph + -ic.] Occurring in the form of an endomorph; or of relating to minerals occurring as endomorphs.

endomychid (en-dom'i-kid), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Endomychidae.

II. n. A member of the family Endomychidae; a fungus-beetle.

Endomychidae (en-dō-mik'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Endomychus + -idae.] A family of trimerous or cryptotetramerous clavicorn beetles, related to the ladybirds or Coccinellidae. They have cylindrical maxillary palpi with the terminal joint filiform; long antennae; an elongated head; often grooves at the base of the prothorax; the dorsal segments of the abdomen partly membranous; the ventral free; the wings not fringed; the tarsi typically 3-jointed, with the second joint dilated; and the claws simple. There are about 400 species, which live on fungi in both the larval and the mature state, and are sometimes called fungus-beetles. In some the tarsi are evidently 4-jointed. The family is most numerous in the tropics.

Endomychus (en-dom'ikus), n. [NL. (Paykull, 1798), < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + μυχός, the innermost part, inmost nook or corner, < μύω, close, shut.] The typical genus of the family Endomychidae. E. coccineus and E. biguttatus are examples. E. bovis is a British species; E. biguttatus is the only North American one.

Fungus-beetle (Endomychus biguttatus). (Line shows natural size.)

endomysial (en-dō-mis'i-al), a. [< endomysium + -al.] Pertaining to or consisting of endomysium.

endomysium (en-dō-mis'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + μῦς, muscle: see muscle.] In anat., the areolar tissue between the fibers of the fasciculi of muscles.

There seems to be a connection between the sarcolemma and the endomysium. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sci., V. 63.

endonephritis (en'dō-ne-frī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + NL. nephritis, q. v.] Same as pyelitis.

endoneurial (en-dō-nū'ri-al), a. [< endoneurium + -al.] Pertaining to or consisting of endoneurium.

endoneurium (en-dō-nū'ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + νεῦρον, nerve.] In anat., the delicate connective tissue which supports and separates from one another the nerve-fibers within the funiculus.

endonucleolus (en'dō-nū-klē'ō-lus), n.; pl. endonucleoli (-li). [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + NL. nucleolus, q. v.] A highly refractive speck or particle of protoplasm in the interior of an ovum; an endoplastule.

The protoplasm is made very opaque by the presence of a very large quantity of yolk spherules. A nucleus containing nucleolus and endonucleoli is always visible after staining or crushing. R. J. H. Gibson, Trans. Roy. Soc. Edin., XXXII. 634.

endoparasite (en-dō-par'a-sit), n. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + παράσιτος, parasite: see parasite.] An internal parasite; a parasite which lives in the internal parts or organs of the host, as distinguished from an ectoparasite, which infests the skin or surface. The protozoans are of this character. The term has no classificatory meaning.

endoparasitic (en'dō-par-a-sit'ik), a. [< endoparasite + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of an endoparasite.

Dr. Grassi has investigated the endoparasitic "Protista," and recognizes five families of Flagellata. Smithsonian Report, 1883, p. 704.

endopathic (en-dō-path'ik), a. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + πάθος, suffering, + -ic.] In pathol., pertaining to the production of disease from causes within the body.

endopericarditic (en-dō-per'i-kār-dit'ik), a. [< endopericarditis + -ic.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with endopericarditis.

endopericarditis (en-dō-per'i-kār-dit'is), n. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + περικάρδιον, pericardium, + -itis.] In pathol., simultaneous inflammation of the endocardium and pericardium.

endoperidia, n. Plural of endoperidium.

endoperidial (en'dō-pe-rid'i-al), a. [< endoperidium + -al.] Pertaining to or of the character of an endoperidium.

endoperidium (en'dō-pe-rid'i-um), n.; pl. endoperidia (-iā). [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + NL. peridium, q. v.] The inner peridium, where two are present, as in Geaster. Compare exoperidium.

endoperineuritis (en-dō-per'i-nū-rī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + NL. perineurium, q. v., + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the endoneurium and perineurium.

endophagous (en-dōf'a-gus), a. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + φαγεῖν, eat, + -ous.] Cannibalistic within the tribe; given to endophagy.

endophagy (en-dōf'a-ji), n. [As endophagous + -y.] Cannibalism practised within the tribe; the practice of devouring one's relations.

endophlebitic (en'dō-flē-bit'ik), a. [< endophlebitis + -ic.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with endophlebitis.

endophlebitis (en'dō-flē-bit'is), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + φλέψ (phlēβ), a vein, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the inner coat of a vein.

endopleum (en-dō-flē'um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + φλοιός, bark.] In bot., the liber or inner bark. See liber.

The internal [layer] or endopleum, which is more commonly known as the liber. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 372.

endophragm (en'dō-fram), n. [< NL. endophragma, < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + φράγμα, a partition, < φράσσειν, shut in, fence in. Cf. diaphragm.] In zool., a kind of diaphragm or partition formed by apodemes of opposite sides of a somite of a crustacean.

endophragmal (en-dō-frag'mal), a. [< endophragm + -al.] Of or pertaining to an endophragm.

The internal face of the sternal wall of the whole of the thorax and of the post-oral part of the head presents a complicated arrangement of hard parts, which is known as the endophragmal system. Huxley, Crayfish, p. 157.

endophyllous (en-dō-fil'us), a. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + φύλλον (= L. folium, a leaf), + -ous.] In bot., being or formed within a sheaf, as the young leaves of monocotyledons.

endophytal (en'dō-fi-tal), a. [< endophyte + -al.] Same as entophytic.

endophyte (en'dō-fit), n. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + φυτόν, a plant.] Same as entophyte.

endophytic (en-dō-fit'ik), a. [< endophyte + -ic.] In bot., same as entophytic.

endophytically (en-dō-fit'i-kāl-i), adv. Same as entophytically.

endophytous (en-dōf'i-tus), a. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + φυτόν, a plant, + -ous.] In entom., penetrating within the substance of plants and trees; living within wood during a part of life, while some transformations are effected: said of the larvae of certain insects.

The larvae of the castanians are . . . endophytous, boring the stems and roots of orchids and other plants. C. V. Riley.

endoplasm (en'dō-plazm), n. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + πλάσμα, a thing formed, < πλάσσειν, form.] 1. In bot., the inner granular and somewhat fluid part of the protoplasm of a cell, as distinct from the ectoplasm. — 2. In zool., the interior protoplasm or sarcodous substance of a protozoan, as a rhizopod, as distinguished from the ectoplasm: same as endosarc. Also called chyme-mass, parenchyma.

endoplastic (en-dō-plaz'mik), a. [< endoplasm + -ic.] Pertaining to or formed of endoplasm.

endoplast (en'dō-plast), n. [NL. endoplastum, < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + πλάσσειν, formed, molded, < πλάσσειν, form.] The so-called nucleus of protozoan animals. The endoplast is regarded as the homologue of the nucleus of any true cell of the metazoic animals. See cuts under Actinosphaerium and Paramecium.

The "nucleus" is a structure which is often wonderfully similar to the nucleus of a histological cell, but, as its identity with this is not fully made out, it may better be termed endoplast. . . . In a few Protozoa there are many endoplasts. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 74.

endoplastic (en-dō-plas'tik), a. [< endoplast + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the endoplast: as, endoplastic substance. — 2. Having an endoplast; being one of the Endoplastica: as, an endoplastic protozoan.

Also entoplastic.
Endoplastica (en-dō-plas'ti-kā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of endoplasticus*, endoplast.] A higher group of the Protozoa, conveniently distinguished from the Monera or lower Protozoa by the possession of an endoplast, the so-called nucleus. See extract under endoplast, and moner. The leading divisions of the Endoplastica, as named by Huxley, are the Amoeboidea (here called Protoplasta), Gregarinida, Infusoria, Radiolaria, and probably the Catallacta.

The Protozoa are divisible into a lower and a higher group. . . . In the latter—the Endoplastica—a certain portion of this substance [protoplasm] (the so-called nucleus) is distinguishable from the rest. [Note] I adopt this distinction as a matter of temporary convenience, although I entertain great doubt whether it will stand the test of further investigation. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 73.

endoplastular (en-dō-plas'tū-lār), a. [< endoplastule + -ar.] Of or pertaining to an endoplastule; nucleolar.

endoplastule (en-dō-plas'tūl), n. [< endoplast + -ule.] The so-called nucleolus of Protozoa, as of an amoeba or other rhizopod, or of an infusorian, which may lie within or by the side of the endoplast. See cut under Paramecium.

Attached to one part of it [the endoplast] there is very generally . . . a small oval or rounded body, the so-called "nucleolus" or endoplastule. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 93.

endopleura (en-dō-plō'rā), n.; pl. endopleurae (-rē). [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + πλευρά, a rib, usually in pl., the ribs, the side.] In bot., the delicate inner coat of a seed. See cut under epispem.

endopleural (en-dō-plō'rāl), a. [< endopleura (ite) + -al.] Pertaining to an endopleurite. Also endopleuritic.

endopleurite (en-dō-plō'rīt), n. [< Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + E. pleurite.] That part of the apodeme of a crustacean which arises from the interepimeral membrane which connects the somites; a pleural or lateral piece of the endothorax, as distinguished from an endosternite.

The floor of the thoracic cavity [of the crayfish] is seen to be divided into a number of incomplete cells, or chambers, by . . . apodemal partitions, which . . . arise partly from the intersternal, partly from the interepimeral membrane connecting every pair of somites. The former portion of each apodeme is the endosternite, the latter the endopleurite. . . . The endopleurite . . . divides into three apophyses, one descending or arthral, and two which pass nearly horizontally inward.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 269.

endopleuritic (en-dō-plō-rī'tik), a. [Gr. ἐνδοπλευρίτις + -ic.] Same as endopleural.

endoplutonic (en-dō-plō-ton'ik), a. [Gr. ἐνδοπλουτικός, within, + E. plutonic.] An epithet applied by some geologists to rocks "supposed to have been generated within the first-formed crust of the earth."

endopodite (en-dop'ō-dit), n. [Gr. ἐνδοπόδιον, within, + ποῦς (pod-) = foot, with -ite.] The inner one of the two main divisions of the typical limb of a crustacean: the opposite of exopodite.

Both endopodite and exopodite are parts borne upon that part which is called the protopodite, and both are variously modified in different parts of the body of the same animal. The epipodite may become a gill, etc. The endopodite becomes in the thoracic region an ambulatory limb, and is then the ordinary "leg" or "claw" of a crab or lobster. When thus fully developed, it consists of 7 joints. These are the coxopodite, basipodite, ischiopodite, meropodite, carpopodite, propodite, and dactylopodite, named from base to tip of the leg, in Milne-Edwards's and Huxley's nomenclature. The nippers or chela at the end of such a developed endopodite are the sixth and seventh of its joints, namely, the propodite and its movably apposable dactylopodite.

endopoditic (en-dop'ō-dit'ik), a. [Gr. ἐνδοπόδιος + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the endopodite.

On the other hand, the inner or endopoditic division of the antenna becomes immensely lengthened, and at the same time annulated, while the outer or exopoditic division remains relatively short, and acquires its characteristic scale-like form.

A, Developed Endopodite, or ordinary ambulatory leg of the crayfish as a thoracic appendage; ab, the whole extent of the endopodite with seven joints; x, coxopodite; 2, basipodite; 3, ischiopodite; 4, meropodite; 5, carpopodite; 6, propodite; 7, dactylopodite; e, filaments borne on coxopodite; d, an epipodite. B and C, appendages respectively of first and second abdominal somite of the male; ab, endopodite; e, exopodite.

endopoditic (en-dop'ō-dit'ik), a. [Gr. ἐνδοπόδιος + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the endopodite.

On the other hand, the inner or endopoditic division of the antenna becomes immensely lengthened, and at the same time annulated, while the outer or exopoditic division remains relatively short, and acquires its characteristic scale-like form.

Huxley, Crayfish, p. 218.

Endoprocta (en-dō-prok'ta), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of endoproctus*; see tendoproctus.] A division of the Polyzoa, established by Nitsche, having the anus inside of the circle of tentacles: opposed to Ectoprocta.

In the Endoprocta, . . . the endocyst is composed of only one layer, and the endoderm of the alimentary canal has no second or external coat. The perivisceral cavity, or interspace between the endoderm and ectoderm, is occupied by ramified mesodermal cells.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 571.

endoproctous (en-dō-prok'tus), a. [Gr. ἐνδοπροκτός, < Gr. ἐνδο, within, + προκτός, anus.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Endoprocta: as, an endoproctous polyzoon.

endopile (en-dop'il), a. [Gr. ἐνδοπίλος, within, + πίλος, feather, down, wing, leaf.] Same as monocotyledonous: an epithet proposed by Lestiboudois, because the plumule is inclosed within the cotyledon.

endoral (en-dō'ral), a. [Gr. ἐνδορᾶλ, within, + ῥαλ (or-), mouth, + -al.] Situated between the adoral and preoral cilia in certain Oxytrichidae: said of certain cilia.

endore¹, v. t. [ME. endoren, endouren, < OF. endorer, gild, glaze, < en + dorer, F. dorer, gild, < LL. deaurare, gild: see deaurate, and cf. adore², Dorado, doryl.] In cookery, to make of a bright golden color, as by the use of the yolks of eggs; glaze.

Enbroche fit fayre, . . .

Endoreut with golkes of egges then

With a fedyr at fire.

Liber Cure Cocorum, p. 37.

Potage . . . with roasted mutton, veal, pork,

Chekyns or endoured pygona.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 278.

Darielles [curries] endordide, and daynteez ynewe.

Morte Arthur (E. E. T. S.), l. 199.

endore², v. t. [ME. endoren, var. of adoren, adore: see adore¹.] To adore.

Rebuke me neuer with wordes felle,

Thag I forloyne me dere endorde.

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), l. 388.

endorhizal (en-dō-rī'zal), a. [Gr. ἐνδορρίζων, within, + ρίζα, root, + -al.] In bot., having the radicle of the embryo inclosed within a sheath: a characteristic of endogenous plants. See cut under endogen.

endorhizous (en-dō-rī'zus), a. Same as endorhizal.

endorsable, endorse, etc. See indorsable, etc.

endosalpingitis (en-dō-sal-pin-jī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδο, within, + σάλπιγξ, a trumpet, > L.

salpinx (salping-), + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the lining membrane of a Fallopian tube.

endosarc (en-dō-sārk), n. [Gr. ἐνδοσάρκ, within, + σάρξ (sark-), the flesh.] In zool., the inner or interior sarcod or protoplasm of the amœbæ or other protozoans, in any way distinguished from the exterior sarcodous substance or ectosarc; endoplasm. It corresponds to the general substance of a cell, as distinguished from a cell-wall and cell-nucleus. See cut under Paramœcium.

endosarcodous (en-dō-sār'kō-dus), a. [Gr. ἐνδοσάρκος (sarcod) + -ous.] Same as endosarcous.

endosarcous (en-dō-sār-kus), a. [Gr. ἐνδοσάρκος + -ous.] Pertaining to or of the nature of endosarc.

endoscope (en-dō-skōp), n. [Gr. ἐνδοσκόπος, within, + σκοπεῖν, view.] A diagnostic instrument designed for obtaining a view of some internal part of the body, especially the bladder, uterus, and stomach.

endoscopic (en-dō-skōp'ik), a. [Gr. ἐνδοσκοπικός + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to or effected by means of an endoscope.—2. In math., viewing coefficients with reference to their internal constitution as composed of roots or other elements. Thus, the methods of Lagrange and Abel for resolving an equation are endoscopic. J. J. Sylvester, 1853.

Endosiphon (en-dō-sī'fōn), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδοσίφων, within, + σίφων, a tube.] The inner siphon of cephalopods; a median tube, inside the tube formed by the true funnels connecting the apices of the fleshy sheaths, and surrounded by a layer of shell.

This, the endosiphon, had the same thin covering as the sheaths themselves or the secondary diaphragms.

A. Hyatt, Proc. Amer. Assoc. Adv. Sci., XXXII. 328.

endosiphonal (en-dō-sī'fōn'al), a. [Gr. ἐνδοσίφωνος + -al.] Pertaining to or having the character of an endosiphon.

endosiphonate (en-dō-sī'fōn-āt), a. [Gr. ἐνδοσίφωνος + -ate.] Having an endosiphon.

The endosiphonate and transitional types (of cephalopods) of these periods have common characters. A. Hyatt, Proc. Amer. Assoc. Adv. Sci., XXXII. 328.

endoskeletal (en-dō-skē'l'e-tal), a. [Gr. ἐνδοσκελετός + -al.] Of or pertaining to the endoskeleton.

endoskeleton (en-dō-skē'l'e-tōn), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδοσκέλετον, within, + σκελετόν, a dry body: see skeleton.] In anat., the internal skeleton or framework of the body; the whole bony, cartilaginous, or other hard structure Segment of Endoskeleton from Thoracic Region of Crocodile.

C, centrum of a vertebra, over which rises the neural arch, inclosing the neural canal and ending in NS, the neural spine; Z, prezygapophysis; Z', postzygapophysis; T', transverse process which articulates with T, tubercle of a rib; C.P., that which articulates with C, capitulum of a rib; V.P., ossified vertebral rib, or pleurapophysis; P.P., cartilaginous part of same; S.T., sternal rib, or hemapophysis; S, segment of sternum; P.U., uncinate process of a rib or epipleura. From C.P. to S, on either side, is the hemal arch.

which lies within the integument, and is covered by flesh and skin, as distinguished from the exoskeleton. In man and nearly all other mammals it constitutes the whole skeleton. In invertebrates the term covers any hard interior framework supporting soft parts, as the apodermal system of arthropods, the cuticle of a squid, etc. The endoskeleton of vertebrates is divisible into two independent portions: the axial endoskeleton, belonging to the head and trunk, and the appendicular endoskeleton, to the limbs. The axial endoskeleton consists of the entire series of vertebral and cranial segments, including ribs, breast-bones, hyoid bones, and jaws. The appendicular endoskeleton consists of the bones of the limbs, regarded as diverging appendages, and inclusive of the pectoral and pelvic arches (shoulder- and hip-girdles), by which these appendages are attached to the axial elements.

endosmic (en-dōsm'ik), a. Same as endosmotic. endosmometer (en-dōsmō-m'et-ēr), n. [= F. endosmomètre; < Gr. ἐνδοσμός, within, + μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for measuring the force of endosmotic action.

endosmometric (en-dōsmō-met'rik), a. [Gr. ἐνδοσμομετρικός + -ic.] Pertaining to or designed for the measurement of endosmotic action.

endosmose (en-dōsmōs), n. [= F. endosmose, < NL. endosmosis, q. v.] Same as endosmosis.

M. Poisson has further attempted to show that this force of endosmose may be considered as a particular modification of capillary action.

Whevell.

endosmosis (en-dōsmō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδοσμός, within, + ὥμος, impulsion, < ὠθεῖν, push, thrust, impel.]. The transmission of a fluid inward through a porous septum or partition which separates it from another fluid of different density: opposed to exosmosis: see osmosis. The general phenomenon of the interdiffusion of fluids through septa, including both endosmosis and exosmosis, is termed diosmosis or osmosis, but endosmosis is also used in this sense. The phenomena differ from diffusion proper in being affected by the nature of the septum.—Electrical endosmosis, the cathaphoric action of the electric current; the passage of an electrolyzed liquid through a diaphragm from the anode to the cathode. Some of the laws of the phenomenon have been made out, although it is not fully understood. The amount which passes is proportional to the intensity of the current and to the specific resistance of the liquid, and is independent of the area and thickness of the diaphragm. The hydrostatic pressure required to present the phenomenon is proportional to the thickness and inversely as the area of the diaphragm.

endosmotic (en-dōsmō'tik), a. An incorrect form for endosmotic or endosmic.

endosmotic (en-dōsmō'tik), a. [Gr. ἐνδοσμοτικός + -ic.] Of or pertaining to endosmosis; of the nature of endosmosis. Also endosmic.

Root-pressure is probably a purely physical phenomenon, due to a kind of endosmotic action taking place in the root-cells.

Bessey, Botany, p. 174.

Endosmose is independent of any interchange, since it results entirely from the attraction of the dissolving substance for the solvent; and this attraction is invariable at the same temperature, and may be termed endosmotic force.

Sachs, Botany (trans.), p. 597.

Endosmotic equivalent, the number expressing the ratio of the amount by weight of water which passes through a porous membrane into a saline solution to that of the amount of salt passing in the opposite direction.

endosmotically (en-dōsmō'ti-kal-i), adv. By means of endosmosis; in an endosmotic manner.

The nutritive fluid passes endosmotically into the body parenchyma.

Clavus, Zoology (trans.), p. 307.

endosomal (en-dō-sō-mal), a. [Gr. ἐνδοσώματος + -al.] Of or pertaining to the endosome of a sponge.

endosome (en-dō-sōm), n. [Gr. ἐνδοσώμα, within, + σώμα, body.] The innermost part of the body of a sponge, composed of endoderm and its associated deep mesoderm, exclusive of the choanosome: distinguished from both choanosome and ectosome.

In some sponges a part of the endoderm and associated mesoderm may likewise develop independently of the rest of the sponge, as in the Hexactinellida, where the choanosome forms a middle layer between a reticulation of ectosome on the one side and of endoderm and mesoderm, i. e., endosome, on the other.

Encyc. Brit., XXII. 415.

endosperm (en-dō-spēr'm), n. [Gr. ἐνδοσπέρμα, within, + σπέρμα, seed.] In bot., the albumen of the seed; the substance stored in the ovule or seed about the embryo for its early nourishment. By recent authors it is limited to the deposit formed within the embryo-sac. In some seeds, as of the Cannaceæ, there is an additional deposit within the testa, but outside of the embryo-sac, which is distinguished as the perisperm. See albumen, 2, and cut under episperm.

The macrosperme of these plants gives rise to a small cellular prothallium bearing one or more archegonia, which in the Rhizocarpaceæ extends beyond the limits of the spore, but does not become free from it; . . . in the Phanogams, where it is termed the endosperm, it remains permanently . . . enclosed.

Encyc. Brit., XX. 430.

endospermic (en-dō-spēr'm'ik), a. [Gr. ἐνδοσπέρμικος + -ic.] Containing or associated with endosperm: applied to seeds and embryos.

endospore (en-dō-spōr), n. [NL. endosporium, < Gr. ἐνδοσπόριον, within, + σπόρος, seed: see spore.] 1. In bot., the inner coat of a spore, corresponding to the intine of a pollen-grain. Compare epispore, exospore.

Their further history has been traced out by Kirchner; who found that their [endospores] germination commenced in February with the liberation of the spherical endospore from its envelope.

W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 240.

2. In bacteriology, a spore formed within a cell, as distinguished from arthrospore.

Also endosporium.

Endosporeæ (en-dō-spō'rē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδοσπόριον, within, + σπόρος, seed, + -æ.] The second of the two groups into which the Myxomycetæ are divided. It is characterized by the production of spores inclosed within sporangia, and includes all of the order except one genus, which is referred to the Eozoporeæ. It comprises 42 genera grouped under 18 so-called families.

endosporium (en-dō-spō'ri-um), n.; pl. endosporea (-ē). [NL.] Same as endospore.

The zygospore does not immediately germinate; but, after a longer or shorter period of rest, the exosporium and the endosporium burst, and a bud-like process is thrown out.

Huxley, Biology, v.

endosporous (en-dōs'pō-rus), a. [endospore + -ous.] Forming spores endogenously within a cell or spore-cavity: in bacteriology, opposed to arthrosporous.

endoss† (en-dōs'), v. t. [= D. endossieren = G. endossiren = Dan. endossere = Sw. endossara = Pr. endossar = Sp. endossar = Pg. endossar, < F. endossar, OF. endossor, put on the back, indorse; < en, in, + dos, < L. dorsum, the back: see dorse, and cf. indorse, endorse.] 1. To put on the back; put on (armor).

They no sooner espied the mornings mistresse, with disheuled tresses, to mount her tuorie chariot, but they endossed on their armours.

Knight of the Sea, quoted in Todd's Spenser, VI. 294, note.

2. To write; engrave; carve.

Her name in every tree I will endosse.

Spenser, Colin Cloute, l. 632.

endostea, n. Plural of endosteum.

endosteal (en-dōs'tē-āl), a. [endosteum + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to the endosteum; situated in the interior of a bone.—2. Autogenous or endogenous, as the formation of bone; ossifying from the interior of a cartilaginous matrix.

The ossification of the human sternum is endosteal, or commencing within the substance of the primitive hyaline cartilage.

W. H. Flower, Osteology, p. 72.

3. Endoskeletal, as the bone or endosteum of a cuttlefish.

endosternite (en-dō-stēr'nit), n. [Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + sternite.] In zoöl., that part of an apodeme of a crustacean which arises from the intersternal membrane connecting successive somites; a sternal piece of the endothorax. See endopleurite. Milne-Edwards; Huxley.

endosteum (en-dōs'tē-um), n.; pl. endostea (-ē). [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + ὀστέον, a bone.] 1. In anat., the lining membrane of the medullary cavity of a bone; the internal periosteum. It is a prolongation of the fibrovascular covering of a bone into its interior through the Haversian canals, finally forming a delicate vascular membrane lining the medullary cavity.

2. Cuttlebone.

endostoma (en-dōs'tō-mā), n.; pl. endostomæ (-mæ). [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + στόμα, the mouth.] 1. In zoöl., a part situated behind and supporting the labrum in some Crustacea.—2. In pathol., an osseous tumor within a bone.

endostome (en-dōs'tōm), n. [Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + στόμα, the mouth.] 1. In bot.: (a) The orifice at the apex of the inner coat of the ovule. (b) The inner peristome of mosses. See cut under exostome.—2. In zoöl., same as endostoma.

endostosis (en-dōs'tō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + ὀστέον, bone, + -osis.] 1. In pathol., the formation of an endostoma.—2. Ossification beginning in the substance of cartilage.

endostracal (en-dōs'trā-kāl), a. [endostracum + -al.] Pertaining to or consisting of endostracum.

endostracum (en-dōs'trā-kum), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + ὄστρακον, shell.] The inner layer of the hard shell or exoskeleton of a crustacean.

endostyle (en-dōs'tīl), n. [Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + στυλος, a column: see style.] A longitudinal fold or diverticulum of the middle of the hemal wall of the pharynx of an ascidian, which projects as a vertical ridge into the hemal sinus contained between the endoderm and ectoderm, but remains in free communication with the pharynx by a cleft upon its neural side. From one point of view it appears deceptively as a hollow rod, whence the name. Huxley. See cut under Doliolida and Tunicata.

endostylic (en-dōs'tīl'ik), a. [endostyle + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the endostyle of ascidians.—Endostylic cone, a short cecal process of the endoderm forming the extremity of the endostyle in the embryonic ascidian.

The endostylic cone gives rise to the whole alimentary canal of the bud.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 625.

endetow, v. t. [en- + dote. Cf. endow.] To endow.

Their own heirs do men disherit to endetow them.

Tyndale, Works, I. 249.

endotheca (en-dō-thē'kā), n.; pl. endothecæ (-sē). [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + θήκη, a case: see theca.] The hard structure upon the inner surface of the wall, or proper investment of the visceral chamber, of a coral: distinguished from the exotheca, and also from the epitheca.

endothecal (en-dō-thē'kāl), a. [endotheca + -al.] Of or pertaining to the endotheca of a coral; consisting of endotheca, as a portion of corallum.

endothecate (en-dō-thē'kāt), a. [endotheca + -ate.] Provided with an endotheca.

endothelial (en-dō-thē'si-āl), a. [endothecium + -al.] 1. Pertaining to the endothecium.—2. Having the asci inclosed, as in the pyrenomycetous fungi and angiocarpous lichens.

endothecium (en-dō-thē'si-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + θήκη, a case: see theca.] In bot.: (a) The inner lining of an anther-cell. (b) In mosses, the central mass of cells in the rudimentary capsule, from which the archesporium is generally developed.

endothelial (en-dō-thē'li-āl), a. [endothelium + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of endothelium.

endothelioid (en-dō-thē'li-oid), a. [endothelium + -oid.] Resembling endothelium.

The locality of the tumor gives abundant opportunity for the origin of the endothelioid formations.

Medical News, LII. 301.

endothelioma (en-dō-thē-li-ō'mā), n.; pl. endotheliomata (-ma-tā). [NL., < endothelium + -oma.] In pathol., a malignant growth or tumor developed from endothelium.

endothelium (en-dō-thē'li-um), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + θήκη, nipple. Cf. epithelium.] In anat., the tissue, somewhat resembling epithelium, which lines serous cavities, blood-vessels, and lymphatics. It consists of a single layer of thin flat cells, applied to one another by their edges. Also called vasculum and coelarium.

endothermic (en-dō-thēr'mik), a. [Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + θερμῆν, heat, + -ic.] Relating to absorption of heat. Endothermic compounds are those whose formation from elementary substances is attended with absorption of heat, and whose decomposition into other simpler compounds or into elements is attended with liberation of heat. Nitroglycerin and other explosives are examples of endothermic compounds.

endothermous (en-dō-thēr'mus), a. Same as endothermic.

endothoracic (en-dō-thō-ras'ik), a. [endothorax (-ac-) + -ic.] Pertaining to the endothorax of an arthropod; situated in the thoracic cavity.

endothorax (en-dō-thō'raks), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + θώραξ, a breastplate, the chest.] In arthropods, as crustaceans and insects, the apodermal system of the thorax or the cephalothorax, formed by various processes and continuations of the dermal skeleton, and so constituting an interior framework of this part of the body, supporting and giving attachment to soft parts, as nerves and muscles.

These processes are very greatly developed on the cephalothorax of the higher crustacea. They are found chiefly in the head and thorax in many orders of the Insecta, where they form a complicated structure known as the endothorax. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 249.

Endothyria (en-dō-thi-ri-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδόν, within, + θύρα, a door, + -iæ.] A subfamily of Lituolidae with the test more calcareous and less sandy than in the other groups of Lituolidae, sometimes perforate, and with septation distinct.

endouter, v. t. [ME. endouten, < OF. endouter*, later endoubter, < en- + douter, fear, doubt: see en- and doubt.] To doubt; suspect.

And if I ne had endouted me
To have ben hated or assailed,
My thanks wol I not have failed.

Rom. of the Rose, l. 1664.

endow (en-dou'), v. t. [Formerly also indow (also endew, endue: see endue); < ME. endowen, < AF. endower, OF. endower (= Pr. endotar), < en- + dower, doer, F. dower, endow: see dow, dower, dowry. Cf. endue.] 1. To bestow or settle a dower on; provide with dower.

With all my worldly goods I thee endow.

Book of Common Prayer, Marriage Service.

I would not marry her, though she were endowed with all that Adam had left him before he transgressed.

Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1.

A wife is by law entitled to be endowed of all lands and tenements of which her husband was seized in fee simple or fee tail during the coverture.

Blackstone.

2. To settle money or other property on; furnish with a permanent fund or source of income: as, to endow a college or a church.

Our Laws give great encouragement to the best, the noblest, the most lasting Works of Charity: . . . endowing Hospitals and Alms-houses for the impotent, distemp'rd, and aged Poor.

Stillington, Sermons, II. vii.

But thousands die without or this or that,
Die, and endow a college, or a cat.

Pope, Moral Essays, iii. 96.

3. To furnish, as with some gift, quality, or faculty, mental or physical; equip: as, man is endowed by his Maker with reason; to be endowed with beauty, strength, or power.

For the gods virtues that the body is endowed with of nature.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 252.

Being desirous to improve his workmanship, and endow, as well as create, the human race.

Bacon, Physical Fables, ii.

Nature had largely endowed William with the qualities of a great ruler.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

Belongs endowed with life, but not with soul.

O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, x.

Endowed Schools Act, a British statute of 1869 (32 and 33 Vict., c. 59), empowering commissioners to remodel such schools as had been founded and endowed for special purposes, to alter or add to the trusts, directions, and provisions of the endowments, or to make new trusts, etc. Also known as Forster's Act. = Syn. Endue, Endow. See endue.

endower¹ (en-dou'ēr), n. [endow + -er.] One who endows.

endower² (en-dou'ēr), v. t. [en- + dower.] To furnish with a dower or portion; endow.

This once renowned church . . . was gloriously decked with the jewels of her espousals, richly clad in the tissues of learning, and frankly endowered.

Waterhouse, Apol. for Learning (1653), p. 142.

endowment (en-dou'ment), n. [endow + -ment.] 1. The act of settling dower on a woman.—2. The act of settling a fund or permanent provision for the support of any person or object, as a student, a professorship, a school, a hospital, etc.—3. That which is bestowed or settled; property, fund, or revenue permanently appropriated to any object: as, the endowments of a church, hospital, or college.

A chapel will I build, with large endowment. Dryden.

Professor Stokes, having been appointed to deliver three annual courses of lectures, on the endowment of John Burnett, of Aberdeen, chose Light as his general subject.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVI. 129.

4. That which is given or bestowed on the person or mind; gift of nature; in the plural, natural equipment of body or mind, or both; attributes or aptitudes.

Exact in fair endowments. Ford, Lady's Trial, l. 2.

His early endowments had fitted him for the work he was to do.

Is. Taylor.

One of the endowments which we have received from the hand of God.

Summer, Fame and Glory.

The very idea that reforms may and ought to be effected peacefully implies a large endowment of the moral sense.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 478.

Endowment policy, or, in full, endowment insurance policy, a life-insurance policy of which the amount is payable to the insured at a specified time, or sooner if his representatives should die before the time named. = Syn.

3. Bequest, present, gift, fund.—4. Acquirements, Acquisitions, Attainments, etc. (see acquirement); gift, talent, capacity, genius, parts. See comparison under genius.

end-paper (end'pā'pēr), n. In bookbinding, one of the white or blank leaves usually put before and after the text of a book in binding, one or more in each place. End-papers are not to be confounded with the lining papers, of which one leaf is pasted down inside of each cover, and the other corresponds to it in the color of its outer surface.

end-piece (end'pēs), n. 1. A distinct piece or part attached to or connected with the end of a thing; specifically, in a watch, the support for the end of a pivot.—2. A transverse timber or bar of iron by which the ends of the two wheel-pieces of a truck-frame are connected together.

Car-Builder's Dict.

end-plate (end'plāt), n. In anat., the expanded termination of a motor nerve in a muscular fiber under the sarcolemma.

end-play (end'plā), n. The play or lateral motion of an axle, etc. Also called end-shake.

endreet, endry, v. t. [ME. endryen, (only once) erroneously for adryen, adrygen, < AS. ā-dreogan, suffer, < ā- + dreogan, ME. drygen, dryen, dree: see dree.] To suffer.

In courte no longer shulde I, owte of dowte, Dwellen, but shame in all my life endrye.

Court of Love, l. 726.

endruder (en-druj'), v. t. [en- + drudge.] To make a drudge or slave of.

A slave's slave goes in rank with a beast; such is every one that endrudgeth himself to any known sin.

Ep. Hall, Remains, p. 29.

endry, v. t. See endree.

end-shake (end'shāk), n. Same as end-play.

end-speech (end'spēch), n. An epilogue. Imp. Dict.

end-stone (end'stôn), n. One of the plates of a watch-jewel, against which the pivot abuts. E. H. Knight.

enducet, v. t. An obsolete form of induce.

endue¹ (en-dū'), v. t.; pret. and pp. endued, ppr. enduing. [Early mod. E. also endew, indew, now usually indue; < L. inducere, put on (an article of clothing or ornament), clothe, deck, put on (a character), assume (a part): see *indue*¹. Cf. *endue*², with which *endue*¹ is partly confused.] To clothe; invest: same as *indue*¹.

Endue them with thy Holy Spirit.

Book of Common Prayer (English).

Thus by the organs of the eye and ear,

The soul with knowledge doth herself endue.

Sir J. Davies, Immortal. of Soul, xv.

endue² (en-dū'), v. t.; pret. and pp. endued, ppr. enduing. [Early mod. E. also endew; a variant form of endow; partly confused with *endue*¹, *inque*¹.] 1†. To furnish with dower: same as endow, 1.

Returne from whence ye came, and rest a while,
Till morrow next that I the Elfe subdew,
And with Sansfoyes dead dowry you endew.

Spenser, F. Q., I, iv. 51.

2†. To furnish with a permanent fund: same as endow, 2.

There are a great number of Grammar Schooles throughout the realme, and those verse liberallie endued for the better relief of pore scholars.

Quoted in Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. lviii.

3. To invest with some gift, quality, or faculty: used especially of moral or spiritual gifts, and thus partially differentiated from endow, 3.

God may endue men extraordinarily with understanding as it pleaseth him.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 7.

Learning endued men's minds with a true sense of the frailty of their persons.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 32.

Nature was never more lavish of its gifts than it had been to her, endued as she was with the most exalted understanding.

Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 3.

=Syn. 3. Endue, Endow. Endue is used of moral and spiritual qualities, viewed as given rather than acquired; endow, of the body, external things, and mental gifts. (See acquirement.) An institution or a professorship is richly or fully endowed; a person is endowed with beauty or intellect; he is endued with virtue or piety.

Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high.

Cheese that would break the teeth of a new hand-saw I could endue now like an estrich.

Fletcher (and another), Love's Pilgrimage, ii. 2.

Endue is when a Hawk digesteth her meat, not only putting it over from her gorge, but also cleansing her pannel.

Latham's Faulconry (Explan. of Words of Art), 1658.

endowment (en-dū'ment), n. [Also indowment; < *endue*¹, = *indue*¹, + -ment.] The act of enduing or investing, or that with which one is endued; endowment.

enduginet, n. [See *dudgeon*².] Resentment; dudgeon.

Which shee often perceiving, and taking in great endugine, roundly told him that if he used so continually to look after her, shee would clappe such a paire of hornes upon his head.

Gratiae Ludentes (1638), p. 118.

endungeont, v. t. To confine in a dungeon.

Were we *endungeont*d from our birth, yet wee

Would weene there were a sunne.

Davies, Mirum in Modum, p. 26.

endurability (en-dūr'a-bil'i-ti), n. [< endurable: see ability.] The quality of being endurable; capability of being endured.

They use this irritation [of the eye] as a test of the endurability of the atmosphere within the chamber.

B. W. Richardson, Prevent. Med., p. 336.

endurable (en-dūr'a-bl), a. {< F. endurable, < endurer, endure: see endure and -able.} 1. That can be endured or suffered; not beyond endurance.

Novelties which at first sight inspire dread and disgust, become in a few days familiar, endurable, attractive.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., ix.

2. Durable. [Local, Eng. and U. S.]

endurableness (en-dūr'a-bl-nes), n. The state of being endurable; tolerableness.

endurably (en-dūr'a-bli), adv. In an endurable or durable manner; so as to be endured.

endurance (en-dūr'ans), n. [Early mod. E. also indurance; < OF. endurance, F. endurance, < endurer, endure: see endure and -ance. Cf. durance.] 1†. Continuance; duration.

Some of them are of very great antiquity, . . . others of less endurance.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

2. Continuance in bearing or suffering; the fact or state of enduring stress, hardship, pain, or the like; a holding out under adverse force or influence of any kind: as, the endurance of iron or timber under great strain; a person's endurance of severe affliction.

Patience likewise hath two parts, hardness against wants and extremities, and endurance of pain or torment.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 200.

The victory of endurance born.

Bryant, The Battle-field.

3. Ability to endure; power of bearing or suffering without giving way; capacity for continuance under stress, hardship, or infliction; as, to test the endurance of a brand of steel; that is beyond endurance, or surpasses endurance.

O, she misused me past the endurance of a block; an oak with but one green leaf on it would have answered her.

Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1.

To push thee forward thro' a life of shocks,
Dangers, and deeds, until endurance grow
Sinew'd with action.

Tennyson, Oenone.

4†. Delay; procrastination. [Rare.]

My lord, I look'd

You would have given me your petition, that I should have ta'en some pains to bring together Yourself and your accusers; and to have heard you Without endurance further.

Shak., Hen. VIII, v. 1.

[The meaning of the word in the above extract has been disputed, some thinking it equivalent to duration, confinement; others, to suffering.] = Syn. 2 and 3. Fortitude, etc. (see patience); permanence, persistence, continuance, suffering, sufferance, tolerance.

endurant (en-dūr'ant), a. [< F. endurant, ppr. of endurer, endure: see endure.] Enduring; able to bear fatigue, pain, or the like. [Rare.]

The difficulty of the chase is further increased by the fact that the Ibeex is a remarkably endurant animal, and is capable of abstaining from food or water for a considerable time.

J. G. Wood.

endure (en-dūr'), v.; pret. and pp. endured, ppr. enduring. [Early mod. E. also indure; < ME. enduren, enduren, induren, indouren, tr. bear, suffer, intr. last, continue (tr. also as in L., make hard), < OF. endurer, F. endurer = Pr. Sp. OFg. endurar = It. indurare, indurare, tr., bear, < L. indurare, tr. make hard, intr. become hard, ML. bear, endure, < in, in, + durare, make hard, become hard, last, etc., < durus, hard: see dure.] 1. trans. 1†. To make hard; harden; inure.

Therefore of whom God wole he hath mercy, and whom he wole he endurith.

Wyclif, Rom. ix. 18.

That age despyed niceness vaine,
Enur'd to hardnesse and to homely fare,
Which them to warlike discipline did trayne,
And manly limbs endur'd with little care
Against all hard mishaps and fortunelesse misfare.

Spenser, F. Q., IV, viii. 27.

2†. To preserve; keep.

Somer wol it [wine] soure and so confounde,
And winter wol endure and kepe it longe.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 90.

3. To last or hold out against; sustain without impairment or yielding; support without breaking or giving way.

After that the kynge Pignoras smote in to the stour with his swerde in honde, and be-gan to yeve soche strokes that noon armure hym myght endure.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 589.

'Tis in grain, sir: 'twill endure wind and weather.

Shak., T. N., i. 5.

Thou canst fight well; and bravely

Thou canst endure all dangers, heats, colds, hungers.

Fletcher, Valentinian, iv. 4.

Both were of shining steel, and wrought so pure,
As might the strokes of two such arms endure.

Dryden.

4. To bear with patience; bear up under without sinking or yielding, or without murmuring or opposition; put up with.

We shaibe able to brooke that which other men can endure.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. iii.

Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sakes.

2 Tim. ii. 10.

Neither father nor son can ever since endure the sight of me.

Steele, Tatler, No. 25.

Square windows, round Ragusan windows, might well be endured.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 263.

5. To undergo; suffer; sustain.

If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons.

Heb. xii. 7.

And since your Goodliness admits no blot,
Still let your Virtue too indure no stain.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, i. 211.

How small, of all that human hearts endure,
That part which laws or kings can cause or cure.

Johnson, Lines added to Goldsmith's Traveller.

And I, in truth (thou wilt bear witness here),
Have all in all endured as much, and more Than many just and holy men, whose names
Are register'd and calendar'd for saints.

Tennyson, St. Simeon Stylites.

6†. To continue or remain in; abide in.

Absteyne you stilly, that no stoure fall;
And endure furthe your dayes at your dere ese.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 2661.

The deer endureth the womb but eight months.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

=Syn. 4. To brook, submit to, abide, tolerate, take patiently.

II. intrans. 1†. To become hard; harden.

Alsike is made with barley, half nature
A party grene and upon reyes bounde
And in an oven ybake and made to endure.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 163.

2. To hold out; support adverse force or influence of any kind; suffer without yielding.

So that wee may seen aptely, that gif wee will be gode men, non enemye ne may not endure agensit us.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 261.

He was so chaufed when it was a-boute the houre of noone that nothing myght again hym endure.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 549.

A courage to endure and to obey.

Tennyson, Isabel.

3. To continue; remain; abide.

Fre am I now, and fre I will endure.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 62.

Nowe schalle thou lady, belde with me,

In blisse that schall euer be in-dove.

York Plays, p. 495.

Some would keep the boat, doubting they might be amongst the Indians, others were so wet and cold they could not endure, but got on shore.

N. Morton, New England's Memorial, p. 47.

Fresh be the wound, still-renew'd be its smarting,
So but thy image endure in its prime!

M. Arnold, Faded Leaves, Separation.

4. To continue to exist; continue or remain in the same state without perishing; last; persist.

The Lord shall endure for ever.

Ps. ix. 7.

The Indian flag, which covers acres with its profound shadow, and endures while nations and empires come and go around its vast circumference.

Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 121.

=Syn. To last, remain, continue, abide, bear, suffer, hold out.

endurement (en-dūr'ment), n. [< OF. endurement = It. induramento, indurimento; as endure + -ment.] Endurance.

Certainly these examples (Regulus and Socrates) should make us courageous in the endurement of all worldly misery, if not out of religion, yet at least out of shame.

South, Works, VIII. ix.

endurer (en-dūr'ér), n. 1. One who endures, bears, suffers, or sustains.

They are very valiaunte and hardye, for the most part great endurours of cold, labour, hunger, and all hardnesse.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

2. One who or that which continues long, or remains firm or without change.

enduring (en-dūr'ing), p. a. [Ppr. of endure, v.] Lasting; permanent; unchangeable: as, an enduring habitation.

Ah, vain

My yearning for enduring bliss of days

Amidst the dull world's hopeless, hurrying race.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 340.

It is now known that the colouring principle of the Mytilus is so enduring that it is preserved when the shell itself is completely disintegrated.

Darwin, Geol. Observations, ii. 209.

Can I have any absolute certainty that what seem to me to be the feelings of an enduring "me" may not really be those of something utterly unknown?

Mivart, Nature and Thought, p. 25.

enduring (en-dūr'ing), prep. [ME. enduryng; ppr. of endure, v., used like during, prep.] During. [Old Eng., and local U. S.]

Ther to warde and kepe hir faders treasure;

Enduryng hir life.

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), i. 4629.

enduringly (en-dūr'ing-li), adv. Lastingly; for all time.

Already at the end of the first Punic war some eminent Romans were in their full manhood, whose names are enduringly associated with the events of the second.

Dr. Arnold, Hist. Rome, xlii.

enduringness (en-dūr'ing-nes), n. The quality of enduring; durability; permanence. H. Spenser.

endways (end'wāz), adv. [< end + -ways for -wise.] Same as endwise.

endwise (end'wiz), adv. [< end + -wise.] 1. On end; erectly; in an upright position.

Pitiful huts and cabins made of poles set endwise.
Ray, Works of Creation.

2. With the end forward or upward: as, to present or hold a staff endwise.

endyma (en'di-mä), n. [NL. (Wilder), < Gr. ἐνδυμα, a garment, < ἐνδύω, put on, get into: see endue, indue.] Same as ependyma.

All parts of the true cavities of the vertebrate brain are lined by a smooth epithelium called ependyma or endyma, the shorter name being preferable.

Wilder and Gage, Anat. Tech., p. 413.

endymal (en'di-mäl), a. [< endyma + -al.] Same as ependymal.

Endymion (en-dim'i-on), n. [NL., < L. Endymion, < Gr. Ἐνδυμίων, in myth. a son of Jupiter and Calyce, beloved by Selene.] 1. In Entom., a genus of butterflies, named by Swainson in 1832. Its only species, E. regalis, is now placed in the genus Eueus.—2. A genus of crustaceans.

endysis (en'di-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνδυσίς, a putting on (of clothing), an entering into; < ἐνδύω, put on, get into: see endyma.] In ornith., the acquisition of plumage by a bird; the act of putting on plumage: opposed to ecdysis.

ene¹, adv. An obsolete contraction of even¹.

ene², n. An obsolete contraction of even².

E. N. E. An abbreviation of east-northeast.

-ene. [< L. -enus (Gr. -νός), an adj. term. as in serenus, serene, terrenus, terrene, etc. Cf. -anus (E. -an), -inus (E. -ine, -in), -onus (E. -one), etc.] 1. An adjective termination of Latin origin, as in serene, terrene.—2. In chem., a termination indicating a hydrocarbon which belongs to the olefine series, having the general formula C_nH_{2n}: as, ethylene (C₂H₄), propylene (C₃H₆).

enecate (en'ë-kät), v. t. [< L. enecatus (also enectus), pp. of enecare, enicare, kill off, < e, out, + necare, kill.] To wear out; exhaust; kill off.

Some plagues partake of such a pernicious degree of malignity that, in the manner of a most presentaneous poison, they enecate in two or three hours, suddenly corrupting or extinguishing the vital spirits.

Harvey, The Plague.

en échelle (on ä-shel'), [F.: en, in; échelle, ladder.] Arranged in horizontal bars, like those of a ladder, as trimmings of any kind upon a garment, or any other ladder-like formation.

enecia (ë-në'shi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἑνεκία, bearing onward, far-stretching, continuous, earlier only in comp. διανεκία, etc., continuous, < διανε-κείν, irreg. 2d aor. associated with διάφerein, carry through or to the end, < διά, through, + ἵνεκεν (✓ ἑνεκ*, ἑνεκν*), associated with φείρεν = E. bear.] A continued fever.

ened¹, n. [ME., also ende, < AS. ened, a duck: see drake.] A duck.

enema (en'e-mä or e-në'mä), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐνέμα, an injection, clyster, < ἐνέμαι, inject, send in, < ἐν, in, + έμαι, send.] 1. Pl. enemata (e-nem'a-tä). In med., a quantity of fluid injected into the rectum; a clyster; an injection.

Many adhere to the old plan and still use enemata of food (and stimulants) not specially prepared, such as ordinary milk, beef-tea, and brandy. Jour. Ment. Sci., XXX. 22.

2. [cap.] In entom., a genus of scarabæoid beetles, founded by Hope in 1837. There are about 6 Mexican and North American species.

enemiabler, a. [ME. enemyable, enmyable, < OF. enemiable, enveniable, enmiable, *< ML. inimicabilis (in adv. inimicabiliter), unfriendly, hostile, < L. in-priv. + amicable, friendly, amicable: see amicable, and cf. enemy.] Hostile; inimical.

A burre he made agen the enmyable [var. enmyable] folc. Wyckif, Ecclus. xlii. 7 (Oxf.).

enemity, n. An obsolete form of enmity.

enemy (en'e-mi), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also enemie; < ME. enemy, enemye, often syncopeated enmy (cf. enmity), < OF. enemi, anemi, F. ennemi = Pr. enemic = Sp. enemigo = Pg. inimigo = It. nemico, < L. inimicus, an enemy, lit. an unfriend, < in-priv. + amicus, a friend: see amicable, amicable, amity. Cf. inimical, inimicus.] 1. n.; pl. enemies (-miz). 1. One who opposes, antagonizes, or seeks to inflict, or is willing to inflict, injury upon another, from dislike, hatred, conflict of interests, or public policy, as in war; one who is hostile or inimical.

With my wyf, I wene,

We schal yow wel acorde,

That watz your enmy kene.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 2406.

I say unto you, Love your enemies. Mat. v. 44.

It [the rhinoceros] is enemie to the Elephant.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 503.

An enemy to truth and knowledge. Locke.

Specifically.—2. An opposing military force. See the enemy, below.—3. A foreign state which is in a condition of open hostility to the state in relation to which the former is regarded, or a subject of such a state.—4. That which is inimical; anything that is hurtful or dangerous: as, strong drink is one of man's worst enemies; a bad conscience is an enemy to peace.

I am sure care's an enemy to life. Shak., T. N., i. 3.

Alien enemy, a natural-born subject of a sovereign state which is actually at war with the state in relation to which such person is regarded.—Public enemy, king's enemy, queen's enemy, an enemy with whom the state is at open war, including pirates on the high seas.—The enemy. (a) Milit., the opposing force: used as a collective noun, and construed with a verb or pronoun either in the singular or plural.

The enemy thinks of raising threescore thousand men for the next summer. Addison, State of the War.

We have met the enemy, and they are ours.

Com. O. H. Perry (in despatch announcing the battle of Lake Erie, Sept. 16th, 1813).

(b) The adversary of mankind; the devil; Satan. (c) Time: as, how goes the enemy? (= what o'clock is it?); to kill the enemy. [Slang.]

"How goes the enemy, Snobb?" asked Sir Mulberry Hawk. "Four minutes gone."

Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby, xix.

=Syn. Antagonist, Opponent, etc. See adversary.

II. a. 1. Inimical; hostile; opposed.

They . . . every day grow more enemy to God.

Jer. Taylor.

2. In international law, belonging to a public enemy; belonging to a hostile power or to any of its subjects: as, enemy property.

Enemy ship does not make enemy goods.

Encyc. Brit., XIII. 195.

enemy¹, v. i. [ME. enemyen, < OF. enemier, ennemier, < L. inimicare, make hostile, < inimicus, hostile, an enemy: see enemy.] To be hostile. Wyckif.

enemy² (en'ë-mi), n. A dialectal corruption of anemone.

Doon f' the world' enemies.

Tennyson, Northern Farmer (O. S.).

enemy³, n. A dialectal (Scotch) corruption of emmet.

enemy-chit (en'ë-mi-chit), n. The female of the stickleback. [Local, Eng.]

enemytet, n. An obsolete form of enmity.

enepidermic (en-ëp-i-dër'mik), a. [< Gr. ἐν, in, + NL. epidermis + -ic.] In med., upon the surface of the skin: used of the treatment of diseases by applying remedies, as plasters, blisters, etc., to the skin.

enerd¹, v. i. [ME. enerden, < en- + erden, < AS. eardian, dwell, < eard, country: see eard.] To dwell; live.

Ofte faght that freike & folke of the Cité,

With Enmys enerdande in ylis aboute.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 12857.

energetic (en-ër-jet'ik), a. [< Gr. ἐνεργητικός, active, < ἐνεργεῖν, be in action, operate, tr. effect, < ἐνεργός, at work, active: see energy.] Possessing, exerting, or manifesting energy; specifically, acting or operating with force and vigor; powerful in action or effect; forcible; vigorous: as, an energetic man or government; energetic measures, laws, or medicines.

If then we will conceive of God truly, and, as far as we can, adequately, we must look upon him not only as an eternal, but also as a being eternally energetic.

N. Grew, Cosmologia Sacra, i. 1.

Nitric acid of 40° is too energetic and costly.

W. H. Wahl, Galvanoplastic Manipulations, p. 34.

The most energetic element in contemporary socialism is political rather than economic.

Rae, Contemp. Socialism, p. 106.

=Syn. Strenuous, assiduous, potent.

energetical (en-ër-jet'ik-al), a. [< energetie + -al.] Same as energetic. [Rare.]

He would do veneration to that person whose name he saw to be energetical and triumphant over devils.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 270.

energetically (en-ër-jet'ik-al-i), adv. With force and vigor; with energy and effect.

energeticalness (en-ër-jet'ik-al-nes), n. The quality of being energetic; activity; vigor. Scott.

energetics (en-ër-jet'iks), n. [Pl. of energetic: see -ics.] The science of the general laws of energy.

A science whose subjects are material bodies and physical phenomena in general, and which it is proposed to call the science of energetics.

Rankine, Proc. of Phil. Soc. of Glasgow, May 2, 1855.

energetic (e-nër'jik), a. [Formerly energick; < F. énergique = Sp. energico = Pg. It. energico (cf. D. G. energisch = Dan. Sw. energisk), < Gr. ἐνεργός, at work, active: see energy.] 1. Energetic; endowed with or manifesting energy. [Rare.]

Arise, as in that elder time,

Warm, energetic, chaste, sublime!

Collins, The Passions.

To me hath Heaven with bounteous hand assigned

Energetic Reason and a shaping mind.

Coleridge, On a Friend.

2. In physics, exhibiting energy or force; producing direct physical effect; acting; operating: as, heat is an energetic agent.

energical (e-nër'jik-al), a. [< energetic + -al.] Same as energie.

The learned and moderate of the reformed churches abhor the foppery of such conceits, and confess our policy to be productive of more energical and powerful preachers than any church in Europe.

Waterhouse, Apol. for Learning (1653), p. 85.

energico (e-nër'jō-kō), a. [It.: see energie.] In music, energetic: indicating a passage to be rendered with strong articulation and accentuation.

energize (en'ër-jiz), v.; pret. and pp. energized, ppr. energizing. [< energy + -ize.] 1. trans. To endow with energy; impart active force or strength to; make vigorous.

First comes, of course, the creation of matter, its chaotic or nebulous condition, and the energizing of it by the brooding spirit. Science, III. 600.

II. intrans. To act with energy or force; operate with vigor; act in producing an effect.

Those nobler ecstasies of energizing love, of which flesh and blood, the animal part of us, can no more partake than it can inherit heaven. Horsley, Works, III. xxv.

Also spelled energise.

energizer (en'ër-jiz-ër), n. One who or that which gives energy, or acts in producing an effect. Also spelled energiser.

Every energy is necessarily situate between two substantives: an energizer, which is active, and a subject, which is passive. Harris, Hermes, i. 9.

energumen (en-ër-gū'men), n. [= F. energumène = Sp. energúmeno = Pg. It. energumeno, < L. energumenus, < Gr. ἐνεργούμενος, ppr. pass. of ἐνεργεῖν, effect, execute, work up to: see energetic, energy.] One possessed by an evil spirit; a demoniac. In the early church the energumens were officially recognized as a separate class, to be benefited spiritually and mentally by special prayer for them, frequent benediction, and daily imposition of the exorcist's hands.

There have been also some unhappy sectaries, viz.: Quakers and Seekers, and other such Energumens (pardon me, reader, that I have thought them so), which have given ugly disturbances to these good spirited men in their temple-work. C. Mather, Mag. Chris., i. 3.

The Catechumens, Energumens, and Penitents, says S. Dionysius, are allowed to hear the holy modulation of Paulus, and the Divine recitation of sacred Scripture, but the Church invites them not to behold the sacred works and mysteries that follow.

J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, i. 208.

energy (en'ër-ji), n.; pl. energies (-jiz). [= D. G. energie = Dan. Sw. energi, < F. énergie = Sp. energia = Pg. It. energia, < LL. energia, < Gr. ἐνέργεια, action, operation, actuality, < ἐνεργεῖν, active, effective, later form of ἐνεργός, at work, active, etc., < ἐν, in, + ἐργον = E. work.] 1. The actual exertion of power; power exerted; strength in action; vigorous operation.

The world was compact, and held together by its own bulk and energy. Bacon, Physical Fables, I, Expl.

There is no part of matter that does ever, by its sensible qualities, discover any power or energy, or give us ground to imagine that it could produce anything.

Hume, Human Understanding, i. § 7.

The last series of cognate terms are act, operation, energy. They are all mutually convertible, as all denoting the present exertion or exercise of a power, a faculty, or a habit.

Sir W. Hamilton, Metaphysics, vii.

We must exercise our own minds with concentrated and continuous energy. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 19.

My desire, like all strongest hopes,

By its own energy fulfill'd itself.

Tennyson, Gardener's Daughter.

2. Activity considered as a characteristic; habitual putting forth of power or strength, physical or mental, or readiness to exert it.

Something of indescribable barbaric magnificence, spiritualized into a grace of movement superior to the energy of the North and the extravagant fervor of the East.

Howells, Venetian Life, ii.

3. The exertion of or capacity for a particular kind of force; action or the power of acting in any manner; special ability or agency: used of the active faculties or modes of action regarded severally, and often in the plural: as, creative energy; the energies of mind and body.

The work of reform required all the energies of his powerful mind, backed by the royal authority.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., II. 5.

4. In the Aristotelian philos., actuality; realization; existence; the being no longer in germ or in posse, but in life or in esse: opposed to power, potency, or potentiality. Thus, first energy is the state of acquired habit; second energy, the exercise of a habit: one when he has learned to sing is a singer in first energy; when he is singing, he is a singer in second energy. See act.

5. A fact of acting or actually being.

All verbs that are strictly so called denote energies.

Harris, Hermes, I. 9.

6. In rhet., the quality of awakening the imagination of the reader or hearer, and bringing the meaning of what is said home to him; liveliness.

Who did ever, in French authors, see

The comprehensive English energy?

Roscommon, On Translated Verse.

Waller was smooth; but Dryden taught to join

The varying verse, the full resounding line,

The long majestic march, and energy divine.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. 1. 269.

7. In physics: (a) Half the sum of the masses of the particles of a system each multiplied by the square of its velocity; half the vis viva. See vis viva. This sense, introduced by Dr. Thomas Young, is now obsolete. It gave rise to the following, which was introduced about 1850 by Sir William Thomson, and is now widely current. (b) *Half the greatest value to which the sum of the masses of all the particles of a given system each multiplied by the square of its velocity, could attain except for friction, viscosity, and other forces dependent on the velocities of the particles; otherwise, the amount of work (see work) which a given system could perform were it not for resistance dependent on the velocities.* The law of energy is precisely the principle that these two definitions are equivalent. This law applies solely to forces dependent alone on the relative positions of particles—that is, to attractions, repulsions, and their resultants. It is shown mathematically that, taking any two level or equipotential surfaces (see equipotential) which a particle might traverse in its motion, the difference of the squares of its velocities as it passed through them would be the same no matter from what point of space it started, nor what might be the direction and velocity of its initial motion. Thus, the square of the velocity at any instant could be deduced from that at any other by simply adding or subtracting a quantity dependent merely on the positions at these instants. In like manner, if a number of particles were moving about, subject to mutual attractions and repulsions, it is shown in dynamics that if to the sum of the masses, each multiplied by the square of its velocity, be added a certain quantity dependent only on the positions of the particles at that instant, this last sum would remain constant throughout the motion. Of these quantities, half the mass of a particle into the square of its velocity is termed its actual energy, or energy of motion—that is, its kinetic activity; while the quantity to be added to the sum of the actual energy in order to obtain a constant sum is termed the potential energy—that is, the latent or slumbering activity, or energy of position; the constant sum being termed the total energy. The corresponding general principle of physics is that the total energy of the physical universe is constant; this is the principle of the persistence or conservation of energy. (See below.) Examples of actual energy are the energy of sensible motion as in a moving cannon-ball, of sound-waves, of heat; of potential energy, the energy of position of a weight raised above the earth, of elasticity as in a bent bow, of electricity, chemical combination, etc. Potential or positional energy and actual or kinetic energy are in incessant interconversion; for positional energy implies force, or a tendency to motion, as much as kinetic energy implies motion or change of position. Thus, in the case of a swinging pendulum, the actual energy is null at the turning-points at the extremities of the swing, while the potential energy is at its minimum when the center of gravity is lowest; and the oscillation, but for resistances (as friction), would continue forever. Another equivalent version of the law of energy is as follows: Suppose a system of bodies were moving under the influence of those positional forces to which the law exclusively applies, and suppose that at any one instant all the particles were to strike squarely against elastic surfaces so as to have the directions of their motions reversed, but their velocities otherwise unaltered; then the whole series of motions would be performed backward, so that the particles would again pass through the same positions of position as they had passed through, and in the same intervals of time, but in the reverse order. Thus, a squarely rebounding cannon-ball in vacuo would move backward over the same trajectory, and with the same velocities, as in its forward motion, plunging into the mouth of the cannon again with exactly the velocity with which it had issued.

The heat which any ray, luminous or nonluminous, is competent to generate is the true measure of the energy of the ray.

Tyndall, Radiation, § 9.

The quantity of energy can always be expressed as that of a body of a definite mass moving with a definite velocity.

Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, art. xcvii.

If we multiply half the momentum of every particle of a body by its velocity, and add all the results together, we shall get what is called the kinetic energy of the body.

W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 29.

Correlation of energies or of forces, the transformability of one form of energy into another. Thus, for example, when mechanical energy disappears, as in friction when a railroad-train is stopped at a station, or in percussion when a cannon-ball is arrested by a target, some other form of energy, chiefly heat, is produced in its place; moreover, there is a definite numerical relation existing between the energy expended and the heat which is produced as its equivalent. (See equivalent.) A water-wheel is an arrangement for transforming the energy of water into some other form of mechanical energy, as for sawing wood or grinding corn; a steam-engine is used to transform the potential chemical energy of coal or wood and oxygen of the air into mechanical energy, as in a mill; and in a voltaic battery the potential energy of the zinc and acid is transformed into the energy of an electric current, and this in turn may be transformed into light and heat, or mechanical motion, or chemical separation (as in electroplating). It is found, however, that in every transformation, while no energy is absolutely lost, a considerable portion is lost as useful or available energy, being transformed into useless heat; further, it can be shown that the process which is continually going on is a change from a higher type of energy to a lower, as from heat at a high temperature to heat at a lower—that is, a degradation or dissipation of energy. If the change were to go on until all bodies were at the same temperature, then no work of any kind would be possible. The principal stores of energy on the earth, available for the purposes necessary to human life and comfort, are: (a) the energy of coal, wood, oil, and other combustibles; (b) the energy of water in motion, or in an elevated position; (c) of air in motion, as the wind; (d) the muscular energy of animals. To these might be added the energy of direct solar radiation, the energy of the tides, and some others of less importance. The source of all these forms of energy, except that of the tides, is to be found in the radiant energy of the sun.—Energy of recoil, the capacity for work which a body has upon a recoil, as a gun when fired.—Energy of rotation or translation, the capacity of a body for doing work in virtue of its motion of rotation or translation. See motion.—Extensive energy, the number of different cooperating powers which enter into a mental state. The phrase is also applied to a kind of elasticity.—Radiant energy, that form of energy which is emitted by a hot body and which is propagated by undulations in the luminiferous ether at a rate of about 186,000 miles per second, as the energy sent out by a stove, by the electric arc-light, or by the sun. Every body sends out radiant energy, whatever its temperature, but as its temperature rises the amount increases, and to the sum of rays before emitted are added others of shorter and shorter wave-length. When the temperature of a solid body is raised to about 600° C. it begins to be luminous—that is, to radiate rays of red light—and as it grows hotter it emits rays corresponding to the successive colors of the spectrum. At 1500° C. it becomes white-hot—that is, radiates all the rays of the spectrum. That portion of radiant energy which is incapable of affecting the eye is generally spoken of as radiant heat, in distinction from radiant light. See heat, light, spectrum.—The law of the conservation of energy or of force, the law that, fundamentally speaking, there are no forces in nature to which the law of energy does not apply; the principle that the total energy of the universe is constant, no energy being created or destroyed in any of the processes of nature, every gain or loss in one form of energy corresponding precisely to a loss or gain in some other form or forms. (See correlation of energies.) This is the great fundamental principle of modern physics; it was perhaps first enunciated by K. F. Mohr in 1837, though several physicists were independently led to its discovery. Those uniformities of nature which present phenomena of irreversible actions—such as friction and other resistances, the conduction of heat and the phenomena of the second law of thermodynamics in general, chemical reactions, the growth and development of organic forms, etc.—cannot, according to this doctrine, result from the laws of force alone, but are to be accounted as statistical uniformities, due to vast numbers of fortuitously moving molecules.—Syn. 2. Activity, intensity, push, stir, zeal.

enervate (ē-nēr-vāt or en-ēr-vāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. enervated, ppr. enervating. [L. enervatus, pp. of enervare, deprive of nerves or sinews, weaken: see nerve.] 1. As the barometric oscillations are due to solar radiation, it follows that the earth and sun together constitute a thermodynamic engine.

Thomson and Tait, Nat. Phil., § 830.

Agricultural, ammoniacal, annular, assistant, atmospheric engine. See the adjectives. — Balance-wheel engine. See balance-wheel. — Binary engine. See binary. — Bisulphid-of-carbon engine, an engine using the vapor of bisulphid of carbon as a motive agent. The liquid boils at 110° F., and at the usual temperature of exhaust-steam will give a pressure of sixty-five pounds to the square inch. The vapor in such engines is condensed after passing through the cylinder, and returned to the boiler to be converted again into vapor; it can be thus used continuously with very little loss. — Caloric engine. See caloric. — Carbonic-acid engine. See carbonic. — Compound engine. See steam-engine. — Compressed-air engine. See compressed. — Concentric engine, a rotating engine. — Cornish engine. See steam-engine. — Cycloidal engine, a machine for engraving the wavy or curved lines upon the plates from which bank-checks, bonds, etc., are printed. The lines are produced by a compound motion given to the graver, or by a combined movement of graver and plate. — Dental engine, an apparatus for conveying power to dental surgical instruments. — Direct-action engine, an engine in which the piston-rod is directly coupled to the connecting-rod. — Disk engine, an engine in which motive power is obtained by the application of steam to the oscillation of a disk. — Double-action engine. See steam-engine. — Electro-dynamic engine, an engine operated by an electric current. — Electromagnetic engine. See electric machine, under electric. — Elevator-engine, a special form of steam hoisting-engine that can be controlled from the elevator-car or from any floor, or made to operate automatically at any point of the travel of the car. — Empty engine. See empty. — Ether-engine, a machine similar to the steam-engine, in which the vapor of ether is substituted for steam. — Geared engine, an engine which actuates the driven machinery through the intervention of gearing. — Half-beam engine, a steam-engine having a beam so arranged as to be moved about a pivot at one end by the action of the engine placed at the other end, the crank being placed beneath the middle of the beam. — Harmonic engine, an electromagnetic engine of small size, invented by Edison.

— High-duty engine, an engine designed to work with minimum consumption of fuel. — Horizontal engine, an engine set with the axes of its steam-cylinders and its center-lines horizontal. — Hydraulic engine. See hydraulic.

— Hydrocarbon engine, another name for the petroleum engine, or for any oil-and-vapor motor. — Inclined engine, an engine of which the line of action is inclined to the horizon. — Internal-combustion engine, an engine in which the working cylinder is also the furnace. — Man engine, an apparatus set in mine-shafts, consisting of two parallel and vertical rods alternately rising and falling, and carrying at suitable intervals platforms, of which a pair set opposite each other at each stroke of the engine. In another form one set of platforms is stationary and fixed to the walls of the shaft, there being but a single oscillating rod. Miners, by stepping back and forth from one platform to another at each stroke of the engine, are raised to the surface or transported to the bottom of the mine. — Marine engine. See marine. — Mogul engine, a locomotive of a peculiar and heavy type, built for hauling heavy trains, and having six coupled driving-wheels and a single pair of truck-wheels. — Non-condensing engine. See non-condensing. — Non-rotative engine, an engine which does not turn a fly-wheel and crank-shaft. — Oscillating engine, an engine in which the piston-rod is coupled directly to the crank-pin, the steam-cylinder oscillating on trunnions to permit the requisite lateral movement of the rod. — Pendulous or inverted oscillating engine, an engine in which the steam-cylinder is supported by and oscillates about trunnions at the upper end, the piston-rod being directly connected to the crank below. — Rose engine. See rose-engine. — Side-lever engine. Same as marine engine. — Stationary engine, any form of motor on a fixed bed, as distinguished from a portable, road, or locomotive engine. — Trunk-engine, an engine in which the connecting-rod is coupled to crank and piston, reaching the latter through a large hollow "trunk" or rod forming a part of the structure. — Twin engine, a combination of two engines of the same construction, coupled so as to work together. — Vertical engine, an engine without a beam, set in the vertical line. — Wildcat engine, a locomotive engine that runs without a train: so called because it has no regular time. [U. S.]

engine (en'jin), v. t.; pret. and pp. engined, ppr. engining. [ME. enginen, engynen, contrive, deceive, torture, < OF. engignier, engigner, engienier, engenhier, contrive, invent, deceive, intrigue, etc., = Fr. enginier = OSP. enginhar, Sp. ingeniar = Pg. enginhar = It. ingegnare, deceive, dupe, etc., < ML. ingeniare, contrive, attack with engines, dep. ingeniari, intrigue, deceive, < L. ingenium, genius, invention, LL. an engine: see engine, n.] 1. To contrive.

And now shal Lucifer leue it though hym loth thinke;

For Gygis the gaunt with a gynne engined

To breke and to bete doune that ben agines Iesus.

Piers Plowman (B), xviii. 250.

2. To assault with engines of war. Davies.
Infidels, profane and professed enemies to engine and batter our walls. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 29.

3. To torture by means of an engine; rack.
The mynistrs of that toun
Han hent the carters and so sore him pyned,
And eke the hostiler so sore engyned,
That they biknewe hir wikkednes anon.

Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, I. 240.

4. To furnish with an engine or engines: as, the vessel was built on the Clyde and engined at Greenwich.

engine-bearer (en'jin-bär'er), n. In ship-building, one of the sleepers or pieces of timber in a steamer placed between the keelson and the boilers of the steam-engine, to form a proper seat for the boilers and machinery.

engine-counter (en'jin-koun'ter), n. A registering device for recording or counting the movements of engines or machinery; a speed-indicator. See speed-recorder.

engined (en'jind), a. Same as engine-turned.

engine-driver (en'jin-dri'vër), n. One who drives or manages an engine; especially, one who manages a locomotive engine: in the United States commonly called engineer.

engineer (en-jin'ër), n. [Formerly ingenier, rarely ingenier; < OF. engignier = Sp. ingeniero = Pg. engenheiro = It. ingegnere, ingegnere, < ML. ingeniarius, one who makes or uses an engine, < ingenium, an engine: see engine. Cf. D. G. ingenieur = Dan. Sw. ingeniör, < F. ingénieur, OF. engigneor, engigneor, one who makes an engine, < ML. ingeniatar, < ingeniare, contrive: see engine, v.*] 1. A person skilled in the principles and practice of any department of engineering.

Engineers are classified, according to the particular business pursued by them, as military, naval or marine, civil, mining, and mechanical or dynamic engineers. (See engineering.) In the United States navy engineers are classed as follows: Engineer in chief, ranking with a commodore and having charge of the Bureau of Steam Engineering at the Navy Department; chief engineers, ranking, according to length of service, with lieutenant-commanders, commanders, or captains; passed assistant engineers, officers who have passed their examination for chief engineers and who rank with lieutenants; and assistant engineers, who rank with ensigns or lieutenants.

2. An engine-driver; one who manages an engine; a person who has charge of an engine and its connected machinery, as on board a steam-vessel. — 3. One who carries through any scheme or enterprise by skill or artful contrivance; a manager. — Chief of engineers, in the United States army, a high official of the War Department, head of the corps of engineers, who has supervisory charge of fortifications, torpedo service, military bridges, river and harbor improvements, military surveys, etc. — Corps of engineers. See corps. — Fleet engineer. See fleet. — engineer (en-jin'ër), v. t. [< engineer, n.] 1. To plan and direct the formation or carrying out of; direct as an engineer: as, to engineer a canal or a tunnel.

Carefully engineered waterways.

Geikie, Geol. Sketches, II. 14.

2. To work upon; ply; try some scheme or plan upon.

Unless we engineered him with question after question, we could get nothing out of him. Cowper.

3. To guide or manage by ingenuity and tact; conduct through or over obstacles by contrivance and effort: as, to engineer a bill through Congress.

An exhibition engineered by a native prince is quite a novelty even in India. The American, VII. 24.

engineering (en-jin'ër'ing), n. [Verbal n. of engineer, v.] 1. The art of constructing and using engines or machines; the art of executing civil or military works which require a special knowledge or use of machinery, or of the principles of mechanics. Abbreviated engin. — 2. Careful management; maneuvering.

Who kindling a combustion of desire,

With some cold moral think to quench the fire,

Though all your engineering proves in vain.

Cowper, Progress of Error, I. 321.

Civil engineering, that branch of engineering which relates to the construction or care of roads, bridges, railroads, canals, aqueducts, harbors, drainage-works, etc. — Electrical engineering. See electrical. — Hydraulic engineering. See hydraulic. — Mechanical or dynamic engineering, that branch which relates strictly to machinery, such as steam-engines, machine-tools, mill-work, etc. — Military engineering, that branch which relates to the construction and maintenance of fortifications, and all buildings necessary in military posts, and includes a thorough knowledge of every point relative to the attack and defense of places. The science also embraces the surveying of a country for the various operations of war. — Mining engineering, that branch which relates to all the operations involved in selecting, testing, opening, and working mines. — Naval or marine engineering, that branch which relates to the construction and management of engines for the propulsion of steamships.

engineership (en-jin'ër'ship), n. [< engineer + -ship.] The post of engineer. [Rare.]

His nephew, David Alan Stevenson, joined with him at the time of his death in the engineership, is the sixth of the family who has held, successively or conjointly, that office.

R. L. Stevenson, in Contemporary Rev., LI. 790.

engine-house (en'jin-hous), n. A building for the accommodation of an engine or engines.

Boilers, dynamos, and engine-house must all be arranged for that size. Elect. Rev., XXII. 243.

engine-lathe (en'jin-läth), n. A large form of lathe employed for the principal turning-work of a machine-shop.

engineman (en'jin-man), n.; pl. enginemen (-men). A man who manages an engine, as in steamers, steam-cars, manufactories, etc.

engine-plane (en'jin-plän), n. In coal-mining, an underground way over which the coal is conveyed by means of an endless chain or rope worked by an engine.

engineer (en'jin'ër), n. [Also ingenier; earlier form of engineer: see engineer.] 1. An engineer: one who manages a military engine.

For 'tis the sport to have the engineer

Hoist with his own petar.

Shak., Hamlet, III. 4 (quartos).

2. A skilful contriver; an artful or ingenious deviser.

He is a good engineer that alone can make an instrument to get preterm. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 134.

There's yet one more, Gabinus,

The engineer of all. E. Jonson, Catiline, v. 4.

engine-room (en'jin-röm), n. The room or apartment of a vessel in which the engines are placed.

Where, for example, are the engine-room logs of any of the ships he warms? The Engineer, LXV. 108.

enginery (en'jin-ri), n. [< engine + -ry.] 1. The act or art of managing engines or artillery.

— 2. Engines collectively; mechanism; machinery; especially, artillery; instruments of war.

Not distant far with heavy pace the foe

Approaching, gross and huge, in hollow cube

Trailing his devilish enginery. Milton, P. L., vi. 653.

I have lived to mark
A new and unforeseen creation rise
From out the labours of a peaceful Land
Wielding her potent enginery to frame
And to produce. Wordsworth, Excursion, viii.
The earth is shaken by our engineries.

Emerson, Success.

With a mighty inward whirring and buzzing of the enginery which constitutes her [an automaton's] muscular system. O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 129.

3. Any carefully prepared scheme to compass an end, especially a bad end; machinations; devices; system of artifice.

The fraudulent enginery of Rome. Shenstone, Economy.
All his own devilish enginery of lying witnesses, partial sheriffs, etc. Macaulay.

Such a comprehensive and centralized scheme of national education, if once thoroughly realized, would prove the most appalling enginery for the propagation of anti-Christian and atheistic unbelief. New Princeton Rev., II. 134.

4. Engineering.

They may descend in mathematics to fortification, architecture, enginery, or navigation. Milton, Education.

engine-shaft (en'jin-shäft), n. In mining, a shaft used exclusively for the pumping-machinery.

engine-tool (en'jin-töl), n. Same as machine-tool.

engine-turned (en'jin-térnd), a. Ornamented with designs produced by a rose-engine. Also engined.

Gower, Conf. Amant., VII. 99.

All the Enginous Wheels of the Soule are continually going. Dekker, Seven Deadly Sins, p. 30.

Those beams, by enginous art, made often to mount and spread like a golden and glorious canopy over the deified persons that are placed under it.

Middleton, Triumphs of Integrity.

That's the mark of all their enginous drifts,
To wound my patience.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iii. 2.

engird (en-gèrd'), v. t.; pret. and pp. engirt or engirded, ppr. engirding. [en-1 + *gird*¹.] To surround; encircle; encompass.

My heart is drown'd with grief,
Whose flood begins to flow within mine eyes;
My body round engirt with misery.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1.

While they the church engird with motion slow.
Wordsworth, Processions in the Vale of Chamouny.

engirdle (en-gèrd'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. engirdled, ppr. engirdling. [en-1 + girdle.] To inclose; surround.

Or when extending wide their flaming trains,
With hideous grasp the skies engirdle round,
And spread the terrors of their burning locks.

Glover, Sir Isaac Newton.

engirt (en-gèrt'), v. t. [For engird, altered through influence of its pp. engirt.] To encircle; engird.

A lily prison'd in a gaol of snow; . . .

So white a friend engirts so white a foe.

Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 364.

engiscope, n. See engyscope.

englad (en-glád'), v. t. [en-1 + glad.] To make glad; cause to rejoice.

Lyke as the lark vpon the somer's daye,

When Titan radiant burnisheth his bones bryght,

Mountheth on hye, with her melodious laye

Of the sonshyne engladid with the lyght.

Skelton, Garland of Laurel, l. 536.

englamt, v. [ME. englaymen, engleymen, besmear, make sticky, cloy, < en-1 + glaymen, gleymen, smear: see glaim.] I. trans. 1. To besmear.

II. n. 1. Collectively, in the plural, the people of England; specifically, natives of England, or the people constituting the English race, particularly as distinguished from the Scotch, Welsh, and Irish.

There goes the Talbot, with his colours spread,

And all the troops of English after him.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iii. 3.

2. [ME. English, Englisch, etc., < AS. Englisc, Ænglisc, neut. adj. as noun (also with a noun, Englisc gereord or getheðð), the English language—that is, the language spoken by the Angles and, by extension, by the Saxons and other Low German tribes who composed the people called Anglo-Saxons. See etymology above, Anglo-Saxon, and def.] The language of the people of England and of the peoples derived from them, including those of English descent in the United States of America, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the British dependencies in India, Africa, and other parts of the world. The signification of the term English, as applied to language, has varied with its changes of signification in political use. Originally applied to the language of the Angles, it came in time to be the general designation of the aggregate of slightly differing Low German dialects, Anglian and Saxon, which was recognized as the national tongue of the Teutonic invaders of Britain. This tongue, now generally known as Anglo-Saxon (see Anglo-Saxon), underwent in the course of time, by the Scandinavian invasion in the ninth century, and by the Norman conquest and the introduction of Norman French in the eleventh century, changes so extensive and profound as to make the "English" language of the later periods practically another tongue. Accordingly, the older stages of the language have at different periods received some special designation, as Saxon, Anglo-Saxon, English-Saxon, or Saxon-English for the language before the Norman conquest, and Old English or Early English for the period between the Norman conquest and the modern period. Recently some British scholars have insisted on using English to cover the whole range of the language, applying Old English, or, as some term it, Old English, to the Anglo-Saxon period. But, apart from the question as to the practical differences of the Anglo-Saxon and the language later called English, this tends to confusion, the term Old English having long had a distinct and well-understood application to the mixed language developed after the Norman conquest. Various divisions have been made of the periods of English. All are more or less arbitrary, there being no absolute gap even between the Anglo-Saxon and the following period. A common division, adopted in this dictionary, is as follows: (1) Anglo-Saxon, meaning usually and chiefly West-Saxon, but including all other Anglo-Saxon dialects, Kentish, Mercian, Old Northumbrian, etc., from the middle of the fifth century, or rather from the seventh century, when the first contemporary records (in Anglo-Saxon) begin, to the middle or end of the twelfth century (A. D. 450 (600)–1150 (1200)); (2) Middle English, also called Old English, from the middle or end of the twelfth century to the beginning of the sixteenth century (A. D. 1150 (1200)–1600); (3) Modern English, or simply English, from the beginning of the sixteenth century to the present time. Each of these periods is divided, when convenient, into three subperiods by the terms early and late applied to the first and the last part of the main periods. The periods of transition cannot be exactly fixed, and in the etymologies of this dictionary the designation "early Middle English," for example, with reference to a word or form, may coincide in date with the designation "late Anglo-Saxon," as applied to another word or form of earlier aspect or spelling. So "early modern English," referring properly to the first part of the sixteenth century (A. D. 1500–1550), may in some cases refer back to the last decades of the fifteenth century, or in regard to archaic words and spellings may extend to the end of the sixteenth century. In particular cases the date of the century or the date of the year is given. Philologically, English, considered with reference to its original form, Anglo-Saxon, and to the grammatical features which it retains of Anglo-Saxon origin, is the most conspicuous member of the Low German group of the Teutonic family, the other Low German languages being Old Saxon, Old Frisian, Old Low German, and other extinct forms, and the modern Dutch, Flemish, Frisian, and Low German (Platt Deutsch). Though with High German, it constitutes the "West Germanic" branch, as Gothic and the Scandinavian tongues constitute the "East Germanic" branch, of the Teutonic family. (See the terms used.) By mixture with the Celtic and Latin of the Anglo-Saxon period, and later with the kindred Scandinavian, and then with the Old French of the Norman and other dialects, especially with the Norman French as developed in England (the Anglo-French), and with later French, and finally, in consequence of the spread of English exploration, commerce, colonization, and contact with nearly all the other great languages of the globe, English has become the most composite language spoken by man. The vocabulary of common life is still about three-fourths of Anglo-Saxon origin; but the vocabulary of literature and commerce contains a majority of words of foreign origin, chiefly Latin or Greek, coming in great part through the Romance tongues, and of these chiefly through French. The languages from which the next greatest contributions have been received are the Scandinavian (Icelandic, Swedish, Danish, Norwegian), the Low German (Dutch, Flemish, etc.), Celtic, Hebrew, Persian, Arabic, Hindustani, Turkish, Malay, Chinese, American Indian, etc. The words derived from the more remote languages are, however, in great part names of products or customs peculiar to the countries concerned, and few of them enter into actual English use.

Spenser, F. Q., IV. ii. 52.

The critical study of English has but just commenced. We are at the beginning of a new era in its history. Great as are its powers, men are beginning to feel that its necessities are still greater.

G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xxviii.

3. The English equivalent of a foreign word; an English rendering.

"Lithecock! it's Latin," the lady said,

"Richard's the English of that name."

Earl Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 269).

And for English gentlemen me thinks it must needs be a pleasure to them to see so rich a toong [as Italian] outvide by their mother-speech, as by the manie-folde Englisses of manie wordes in this manifest.

Florio, It. Dict., To the Reader, p. 14.

4. In printing, a size of type between pica and great primer: in the United States, about 5½ lines to the linear inch.

This line is in English type.

5. In billiards, a twisting or spinning motion imparted by a quick stroke on one side to the cue-ball. All deviations by the cue-ball from such motion as would naturally result in a straight central stroke with the cue, or from the slant given by impact on the side of an object-ball after such a stroke, are governed by the same principle; but as most force-shots have special names (draw, follow, massé, etc.), the word English is generally used only when the ball glances after impact in a direction more or less sharply angular from the object-ball or cushion. Engraulina (en-'grā'li-nā), n. pl. [< Engraulis + -ina.] In Günther's classification of fishes, the first group of Clupeidae. They are characterized by having the mouth very wide and lateral; the intermaxillary very small and firmly united to the maxillary, which is elongate, and scarcely protractile; and the upper jaw projecting. The group is the same as the family Engraulididae or Stolephoridae.

Engraulis (en-'grā'lis), n. [< Gr. ἐγγραυλίς, a small fish (also called ἐγκρασίχολος, < ἐγκρασίς, a mixing in, + χολός, χολή = E. gall, bile).] The typical and most extensive genus of clupeoid fishes of the family Engraulididae. The common anchovy, E. encrasicolus, is the best-known species. The genus is also called Stolephorus. See anchovy.

engrave (en-'grāv'), v. t.; pret. engraved, pp. engraved or engraven, ppr. engraving. [Formerly also ingrave; < OF. engraver, F. engraver, engrave, < en- + graver, engrave: see en-1 and grave.] The Gr. ἐγγράφειν, cut into, engrave, is related, if at all, only remotely: see grave.] 1. To cut in; make by incision; produce or form by incision on a hard surface.

These were the words that were engraven upon her Tombe.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 5.

To all these there be divers Witnesses, both 'Squires and Ladies, whose Names are engraven upon the Stone.

Hovell, Letters, i. vi. 9.

"From Edith" was engraven on the blade.

Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

2. To imprint; impress deeply; infix.

It will scarce seem possible that God should engrave principles in men's minds in words of uncertain significance.

Locke.

3. To cut or carve in sunken patterns; incise with letters or figures, or with the lines representing any object: applied especially to work on metal, but also to work on stone and other hard materials.

So fond were the ancients of these costly and beautiful works that the Emperor Heliogabalus is recorded to have covered his shoes with engraved gems.

Fairholt.

Argent, a Bend Engrailed Gules.

A Bend Engoulée.

engrave²⁴ (en-grāv'), v. t. [<en-1 + grave². Cf. grave¹, v. t.] To deposit in a grave; bury; inter; inhum.

The six had charge of them, now being dead,
In seemly sort their corpses to engrave.

Spenser, F. Q., I. x. 42.

engraving (en-grāv'ment), n. [<engrave¹ + -ment.] 1. The act of engraving, or the state of being engraved.—24. The work of an engraver; an engraving.

We . . . being the offspring of God, ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, the engraving of art and man's device.

Barrow, Expos. of Decalogue.

engraver (en-grāv'vēr), n. One who engraves; especially, an artist who produces ornaments, patterns, or representations of objects by means of incisions on a hard surface; specifically, one who produces such designs with a view to the taking from them of impressions in printers' ink or other pigment.

To work all manner of work, of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer. Ex. xxv. 35.

Images are not made in the brain itself, as the pencil of a painter or engraver makes the image in the table or metal.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 47.

Engravers' sand-bag, a leather cushion tightly packed with sand, used to prop up a copper plate at a convenient working angle, or to permit the free movement of a plate or wooden block, when fine lines are being engraved upon it.

engravery¹ (en-grāv'vēr-i), n. [<engrave¹ + -ery.] The work of an engraver.

Some handsome engraveries and medals.

Sir T. Browne, Miscellanies, p. 210.

engraving (en-grāv'ving), n. [Verbal n. of engrave¹, v.] 1. The act or art of cutting designs, inscriptions, etc., on any hard substance, as stone, metal, or wood. Many branches of the art, as gem-engraving, cameo-cutting, and die-sinking, are of great antiquity.

2. Specifically, the art of forming designs by cutting, corrosion by acids, a photographic process, etc., on the surface of metal plates or of blocks of wood, etc., for the purpose of taking off impressions or prints of the design so formed.

Wood-engraving appears to have come first into use, the earliest dated wood-engraving, representing St. Christopher, bearing the date of 1433, while the earliest engraving worthy of the name from a metal plate was produced by Maso Finiguerra, a goldsmith of Florence, in 1452. Relief-engraving on wood was, however, in use among the Orientals at a far earlier period. In engraving on metal the lines or marks which are to appear on the paper are sunk into the plate, and before being printed from are filled with ink, the rest of the surface being cleaned before the impression is taken. On a block of wood the lines for impression are left prominent, the blank parts being cut away, so that the wooden block serves as a type. Copper and steel plates are printed from separately on a press specially adapted for this use; wooden blocks, on the ordinary printing-press, commonly along with the accompanying text. The wood generally used for fine engraving is box, and the metals commonly employed by engravers are copper and steel. Different methods or styles of engraving on steel or copper are known as aquatint, etching, mezzotint, stipple, line-engraving, etc.

In facsimile engraving, . . . the drawing is made upon the wood with a pen or the point of a brush, generally by another person, and all that the engraver does is just to hollow all the little areas of wood that are left inkless.

P. G. Hamerton, Graphic Arts, p. 413.

3. That which is engraved, or produced by engraving; an engraved representation, or an incised plate or block intended to be printed from; as, an engraving on a monument or a watch-case; a steel or a wood engraving.

With the work of an engraver in stone, like the engravings of a signet, shalt thou engrave the two stones with the name of the children of Israel. Ex. xxviii. 11.

4. An impression taken from an engraved plate or block; a print.—Anaglyptographic engraving, anastatic engraving. See the adjectives.—Bureau of Engraving and Printing. See bureau.

Chalk engraving, a form of stipple engraving used to imitate drawings made in chalk. The grain of the chalk drawing is reproduced by irregular dots of different forms and sizes.—Copperplate engraving, the art of engraving on prepared plates of copper for printing. To the plate is given a surface which is perfectly plane and highly polished. It is next heated sufficiently to melt wax, with which it is then rubbed over, so that when cooled it is covered with a white skin, to which the design or drawing is transferred. The engraver, with a steel point, follows the lines of the drawing, pressing lightly so as to penetrate through the wax and line faintly the copper surface beneath. The wax is then melted off, the surface cleaned, and the engraving is proceeded with, a burin or graver being used to cut the lines, a scraper to remove the slight bur raised by the burin, and a burnisher to soften or tone down the lines and remove scratches. The engraver uses also a woolen rubber and a little olive-oil to clean the face of the plate, in order to render the condition of his work plainly visible; and this rubber serves also to polish off the burrs.—Facsimile engraving, engraving on wood, in which every line is either drawn on the block or else photographed from pen or pencil drawing in reduced size, the work of the engraver being to remove the wood from between these lines. This is the earliest method of wood-engraving, and is called facsimile in contradistinction to tint engraving, in which, the drawing being in wash, gauche, or oil paint, the engraver has to invent the lines, which he cuts in such a manner as to render when printed the exact shades of the original drawing—a method of engraving of comparatively recent origin.—Line-engraving, the art, methods, etc., of engraving in incised lines on metal. Modern line-engravers frequently begin by etching, and complete their work with the dry-point and the burin. After the design has been transferred to the etching-ground, and the parts to be bitten in, such as grass, foliage, sea-waves, and the flowing lines of draperies, have been drawn with the needle, all white objects, such as drapery, satin, clouds, ice, the light parts of water, etc., are stopped out, to preserve them from the corroding acid. A ruling-machine, consisting of a straight bar of steel with a sliding socket having a perpendicular tube containing a diamond-pointed pen attached to its side, is used to lay flat tints, such as clear-blue skies, in parallel lines, either straight or curved, as the shape of the object to be represented may demand. When the plate has been bitten in, the ground is removed and the unbitten parts are engraved with the burin. This instrument is handled in various ways, according to the texture of the object under treatment, as by cross-hatchings, undulating or straight lines, dots in lozenge-shaped or square spaces formed by the intersection of lines, etc.; care being taken to avoid sameness of stroke, and to give as much variety as possible to the necessarily more or less mechanical patterns produced by a stiff unyielding instrument.—Photographic engraving, any method of engraving in which an application of photography is a chief factor in the production of the block or plate from which the impressions are taken.—Photo-intaglio engraving, any process for producing lines on a plate by photography, and subsequently etching them in.—Process engraving, a name often given to photographic engraving. Also called process. (See also etching, heliotypy, lithography, mezzotint, photo-engraving, photogravure, etc.)

engreaten (en-grā'tn), v. t. [<en-1 + great-en.] To make great or greater; augment; aggravate.

As sin is grievous in its own nature, so it is much engreatened by the circumstances which attend it.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, I. 207.

5. To occupy wholly; take up or employ entirely, to the exclusion of other things: as, business engrosses his attention or thoughts; to be engrossed in study.

Barakát, excited by this tale, became engrossed with the desire of slaying his own father, whom he was made to believe to be his father's murderer.

E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, II. 122.

6. To write out in a fair large hand or in a formal or prescribed manner for preservation, as a public document or record. The engrossing of documents was formerly executed in England, and for some purposes till a late period, in a peculiar hand, called the engrossing-hand, derived from the ancient court-hand, nearly illegible to all but experts. The engrossing-hand of the present day is a fair round hand, purposely made as legible as possible. The engrossing of testimonials and other commemorative documents is often a work of much art involving the employment of ornamental characters of various forms, and sometimes also of elaborate ornament, and a studied arrangement for effective display.

That the acts of the yelde and of other yelds precedents shullen be enacted and engrossed in a quayer of parchemyn.

English Guilds (E. T. S.), p. 379.

Jack had provided a fair copy of his father's will, engrossed in form upon a large skin of parchment.

Jer. Taylor (?), Artif. Handsomeness, p. 60.

enormitant† (ē-nōr'mi-tān), n. [Irreg. < enormity + -ant.] A wretch; a monster. L'Es-trange.

enormity (ē-nōr'mi-ti), n.; pl. enormities (-tiz). [Cf. OF. enormite, F. énormité = Sp. enormidad = Pg. enormidade = It. enormità, enormitate, enormità = D. enormiteit = G. enormität, < L. enormita (-s), irregularity, hugeness, < enormis, irregular, huge; see enorm, enormous.] 1. The state or quality of being enormous, immoderate, or extreme; atrociousness; vastness: in a bad sense: as, the enormity of his offense.

We are told that crimes of great enormity were perpetrated by the Athenian Government and the democracies under its protection.
Macaulay, Mitford's Hist. Greece.

2. Enormousness; immensity: without derogatory implication. [Rare.]

In the Shakspeare period we see the fulness of life and the enormity of power throwing up a tropical exuberance of vegetation.
De Quincey, Style, iii.

3. That which surpasses endurable limits, or is immoderate, extreme, or outrageous; a very grave offense against order, right, or decency; atrocious crime; an atrocity.

And if any deeme it a shame to our Nation to haue any mention made of those inormities, let them peruse the Histories of the Spanyards Discoveries and Plantations.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, I. 164.

As to salutations, . . . I observe, as I stroll about town, there are great enormities committed with regard to this particular.
Steele, Spectator, No. 259.

=Syn. 1 and 3. Enormity, Enormousness. Enormousness is strictly limited to vastness in size; enormity, to vastness in atrocity, baseness, etc.

enormous (ē-nōrm'us), a. [L. enormis = (see enorm) + -ous. Cf. enormious.] 1†. Deviating from or transgressing the usual measure or rule; abnormal.

An enormous harvest here, and every appearance of peace and plenty.
Sydney Smith, To the Countess Grey.

The mischiefs wrought by uninstructed law-making, enormous in their amount as compared with those caused by uninstructed medical treatment, are conspicuous to all who do but glance over its history.

H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 48.

4. Extremely wicked; uncommonly atrocious: as, enormous crime or guilt.

A certaine fellow . . . had been a notorious robber and a very enormous liver.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 91.

5†. Disordered; perverse.

I . . . shall find time
From this enormous state—seeking to give Losses their remedies.
Shak., Lear, ii. 2.

The influences of a spirit possess'd of an active and enormous imagination may be malign and fatal, where they cannot be resisted.
Glanville, Essays, vi.

=Syn. 3. Enormous, Immense, Excessive, huge, vast, monstrous, prodigious, gigantic, immoderate, unwildly. The first three words agree in expressing greatness and the first two vastness; anything, however small, is excessive if for some special reason too great in amount. Literally, enormous is out of rule, out of proportion; immense, unmeasured, immeasurable; excessive, going beyond bounds, surpassing what is fit, right, tolerable, etc. Enormous is peculiarly applicable to magnitude, primarily physical, but also moral: as, enormous egotism; immense, to extent, quantity, and number: as, an immense national debt; immense folly; excessive, to degree: as, an excessive dose; an excessive opinion of one's own merits.

The total quantity of saline matter carried invisibly away by the Thames from its basin above Kingston will . . . reach, in the course of a year, to the enormous amount of 548,230 tons.
Huxley, Physiography, p. 126.

The controversy between Protestantism and Catholicism comprises an immense mass of complicated and heterogeneous arguments.
Lecky, Rationalism, I. 177.

An excessive expenditure of nerve-force involves excessive respiration and circulation, and excessive waste of tissue.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 21.

4. Villainous, Abominable, etc. (see nefarious); heinous, atrocious.

enormously (ē-nōr'mus-li), adv. In or to an enormous degree; extremely; vastly; beyond measure.

The rise in the last year . . . affords the most consoling and encouraging prospect. It is enormously out of all proportion.
Burke, A Regicide Peace, iii.

But there can be no doubt that all the forms of living matter are enormously complex in chemical constitution.
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 815.

enormousness (ē-nōr'mus-nes), n. The state of being enormous or extreme; greatness beyond measure.

The nexte daye, Frydaye, that was Newe Yeres daye, there was metely wynde yough, but it was so scarce towarde oure waye that we made noo speide.
Sir R. Guyford, Pylgrymage, p. 72.

How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare!
Luke xv. 17.

It were enough to put him to ill thinking.
Shak., Othello, iii. 4.

Have you not yet found means enow to waste
That which your friends have left you?
B. Jonson, Every Man in His Humour, i. 1.

[Enough usually follows the noun which it qualifies, but it is sometimes put before it.

There is not enough leek to swear by.
Shak., Hen. V., v. 1.]

=Syn. Sufficient, Competent, etc. See adequate.

II. n. A quantity of a thing or act, or a number of things or persons, sufficient to satisfy desire or want, or adequate to a purpose; sufficiency: as, we have enough of this sort of cloth.

He answerde, that he was gret Lord y now, and well in pees, and hadde yough of worldly Richcesse.
Maudeville, Travels, p. 146.

Enough is a feast; more than enough is counted foolishness.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 83.

And Esau said, I have enough, my brother.
Gen. xxxiii. 9.

What I attempted to consider was the mischief of setting such a value upon what is past as to think we have done enough.
Steele, Spectator, No. 374.

Enough and enough, more than enough.

Every one of us, from the bare sway of his own inherent corruption, carrying enough and enough about him to assure his final doom.
South, Sermons, VI. ccxvi.

=Syn. Plenty, abundance.

enough (ē-nuf'), adv. [Early mod. E. also inough, etc., and enew, etc.; < ME. enogh, etc. (like the adj.), < AS. genōh (= OS. ginog, ginuog = OFries. enōch, etc., = D. genoeg = LG. genaug, enau, naug = OHG. MHG. ginuog, G. genug, etc.), adv., neut. acc. of adj.] 1. In a quantity or degree that answers the purpose, satisfies, or is equal to the desires or wants; to a sufficient degree; sufficiently.

The wey from Rome it ys knowne perfyghtly I now with many Sondry persons to Englund, And ther for I doo not wryght itt.
Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 67.

The land, behold, it is large enough for them.
Gen. xxxiv. 21.

I have seen many a philosopher whose world is large enough for only one person.
Emerson, Society and Solitude.

2. To a notable extent; fairly; rather: used to denote a slight augmentation of the positive degree, the force depending upon the connection or the emphasis: as, he is ready enough to embrace the offer.

It is sometimes pleasant enough to consider the different notions which different persons have of the same thing.
Addison.

Another admired smile in the same play, . . . though academical enough, is certainly just.
Goldsmith, Sequel to a Poetical School.

3. In a tolerable or passable degree: used to denote diminution, or a degree or quality rather less than is desired, or such a quantity or degree as commands acquiescence rather than full satisfaction: as, the performance is well enough.

I was . . . virtuous enough: swore little; dined, not above seven times a week.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iii. 3.

Thou singest well enough for a shift.
Shak., Much Ado, iii. 3.

4†. To a great degree; very much.

Game of hounde's he louede inow & of wilde best.
Robert of Gloucester, I. 375.

enough (ē-nuf'), interj. An elliptical exclamation, signifying 'it (or that) is enough,' 'I have had enough,' 'you have done enough,' etc.

Lay on, Macduff!

And damn'd be him that first cries "Hold, enough!"
Shak., Macbeth, v. 7.

Henceforth I'll bear

Affliction, till it do cry out itself, Enough, enough, and die.
Shak., Lear, iv. 6.

enounce (ē-noun'), v. t.; pret. and pp. enounced, ppr. enouncing. [Cf. F. énoncer = Sp. Pg. enunciar = It. enunciare, enunziare, < L. enunciare, prop. enunziare, say out, declare: see enunciate. Cf. announce, denounce, etc.] To utter; declare; enunciate; state, as a proposition or an argument.

Aristotle, in whose philosophy this presumption obtained the authority of a principle, thus enounces the argument.
Sir W. Hamilton.

Very few of the enlightened deputies who occasionally enounce the principle [the necessity of good roads for the nation] feel the necessity of having good roads in their own district.
D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 226.

enouncement (ē-noun's'ment), n. [Cf. enounce + -ment.] The act of enouncing; enunciation.

It might seem to him too evidently included in the very conception of the argument to require enouncement.
Sir W. Hamilton.

enourn†, v. t. See enorn.

enow (ē-nou'), a., n., and adv. A dialectal or obsolete form of enough.

enpaiet†, v. t. A Middle English form of impair.

en passant (on pā'son'), v. i. [F.: en, in, < L. in; passant, verbal n. of passer, pass.] While passing; by the way: often used as introductory to an incidental remark or a sudden disconnected thought. In chess, when, on moving a pawn two squares, an adversary's pawn is at the time in such a position as to take the pawn moved if it were moved but one square, the moving pawn may be taken en passant, the phrase being used in its literal sense.

enpatron† (en-pā'tron), v. i. [Cf. en-1 + patron.] To have under one's patronage or guardianship; be the patron saint of.

For these, of force, must your oblations be,
Since I their altar, you enpatron me.
Shak., Lover's Complaint, I. 224.

enpayret†, enpeirot†, v. t. Middle English forms of impair.

en pied (on pyā), v. i. [F.: en, in, on; pied, < L. pes (ped-) = E. foot.] In her-, standing erect: said of a creature used as a bearing, especially a bear.

He swore consent to your succession,
His oath enrolled in the parliament.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 1.

An unwritten law of common right, so engraven in the hearts of our ancestors, and by them so constantly enjoyed and claimed, as that it needed not enrolling. Milton.

3†. To roll; involve; wrap.

Great heapes of them, like sheepe in narrow fold,
For hast did over-runne, in dust enrould.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. iii. 41.

To enroll one's self, to place one's name upon a roll or list; enlist as a soldier.

All the citizens capable of bearing arms enrolled themselves. Prescott.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Enlist, Register, etc. See record, v.

enroller (en-rô'lér), n. [Formerly also inroller; cf. F. enrôleur.] One who enrolls or registers. enrolment, enrollment (en-rôl'ment), n. [Formerly also inrolment; < F. enrôlement, < enrôler, enroll: see enroll.] 1. The act of enrolling; specifically, the registering, recording, or entering of a deed, judgment, recognizance, acknowledgment, etc., in a court of record. In chancery practice a decree, though awarded by the court, was not deemed fixed until it had been engrossed on parchment and delivered to the proper clerk as a roll of the court.

He appointed a general review to be made, and enrolment of all Macedonians. Holland, tr. of Livy, p. 1221.

2. That in which anything is enrolled; a register; a roll.

The king himself caused them to be enrolled, and testified by a notary public; and delivered the enrolments, with his own hands, to the bishop of Salisbury.

Sir J. Davies, State of Ireland.

Clerk of enrolments. See clerk.—Statute of enrolment, an English statute of 1535, enacting that no land shall pass by bargain and sale unless it be by writing sealed, indented, and enrolled.—Statute of enrolments. See statute.

enroot (en-rôt'), v. t. [< en-1 + root¹.] To fix by the root; fix fast; implant deep.

His foes are so enrooted with his friends,
That, plucking to unfix an enemy,
He doth unfasten so and shake a friend.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 1.

enround (en-round'), v. t. [< en-1 + round².] 1. To make round; swell.

And other while an hen wol have the pippe,
A white pellet that wol the tonge enrounde,
And softly off wi] wol with thi nailes slippe.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 22.

2. To environ; surround; inclose.

Upon his royal face there is no note
How dread an army hath enrounded him.

Shak., Hen. V., iv. (cho.).

en route (on rô't). [F.: en, in; route, way, route: see route.] On the way; upon the road.

ens (enz), n.; pl. entia (en'shi-ä). [ML., an object, < L. en(t)s, ppr. of esse, be (first used, says Priscian, by Julius Caesar); formed after Gr. ên (bv-); the earlier form sen(t)s* appears in absen(t)s, E. absent, præ-sen(t)s, E. present. See am (under be), and cf. essence.] 1. That which in any sense is; an object; something that can be named and spoken of.

Ens has been viewed as the primum cognitum by a large proportion, if not the majority of philosophers.

Sir W. Hamilton, Reid's Works, p. 934.

To thee, Creator uncreate, O Entium Ens! divinely great.

M. Green, The Spleen.

We cannot speak of a thing at all except in terms of feeling, cannot imagine an ens except in relation to a sensation. G. H. Leves, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. vi. § 13.

2. The same as first ens (which see, below).

Johnson.—Apparent or intentional ens, a real but unsubstantial appearance, as a rainbow.—Complex ens, a fact, as that Columbus discovered America. Not to be confounded with a composite ens, which is an object composed of different objects.—Dependent ens, that which is caused by another: opposed to independent ens.—Ens of reason (ens rationalis), a product of mental activity.—Ens per accidens, something existing only as an accident of a substance, or ens per se.—Fictitious ens, a product of the inventive imagination.—First ens (ens primum), with Paracelsus and other old chemists, that which contains the virtue of the substance from which it is extracted.

This liquor, being sealed up in a convenient glass, must be exposed to the sun for about six weeks, at the end of which time there will swim at the top of it the primum ens of the plant in a liquid form, transparent, and either green or red or perhaps of some other colour, according to the nature of the plant.

Boyle, Usefulness of Nat. Phil., II., Essay 5.

Imaginary ens, an object of imagination in its widest sense. Thus, an object remembered is an imaginary ens.—Most perfect ens (ens realissimum), that whose essence involves all perfections, including existence.

Being is not a predicate which can be found in the subject of any judgment, and if we desire to add it synthetically, we must have some third term beyond the idea of the subject. Such third term, possible experience, is wanting in the case of the Ens Realissimum, which transcends experience. Adamson, Philos. of Kant.

Necessary ens, that the non-existence of which involves contradiction, owing to its having been defined as existent.

—Objective ens, something which exists in the mind, but only in so far as it is an object of perception.—Positive ens, something not a mere privation or negation.—Real ens, anything whose characters are independent of what any person or any number of persons may think them to be.—Relative or respective ens, something which exists only so far as a correlate exists.—Subjective ens, something which has an existence otherwise than merely as an object.

ensafet (en-sáf'), v. t. [< en-1 + safe.] To render safe.

ensaint, v. t. [< en-1 + saint¹.] To canonize.

For his enainting, looke the almanacke in the beginning of April, and see if you can find out such a saint as Saint Gildarde, which, in honour of this gilded fish, the pope so enainted.

Nashe, Lenten Stuffe (Harl. Misc., VI. 174).

ensamet, v. t. See enseam², 2.

ensamet, n. [< ensame, v.] The grease of a hawk.

ensample (en-sam'pl), n. [< ME. ensample, < OF. ensample, an alteration, with en- for es-, of OF. essample, example: see example.] 1†. A sample or specimen; an instance; a typical example.

Yet better were attence to let me die,
And shew the last ensample of your pride.

Spenser, Sonnets, xxv.

2. A pattern or model; a guiding example. [Archaic and poetical.]

Ze scholde zeven ensample to the lewed peple, for to do wel; and zee zeven hem ensample to don eylle.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 187.

Neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock.

1 Pet. v. 3.

And drawing foul ensample from fair names,
Sinn'd also, till the loathsome opposite
Of all my heart had destined did obtain,
And all thro' thee!

Tennyson, Guinevere.

ensample (en-sam'pl), v. t. [< ME. ensample; < ensample, n.] To exemplify; show by example.

Homere, who in the Persons of Agamemnon and Ulysses hath ensampled a good governour and a virtuous man.

Spenser, F. Q., To the Reader.

ensanguine (en-sang'win), v. t.; pret. and pp. ensanguined, ppr. ensanguining. [< en-1 + sanguine (< L. sanguis, blood): see sanguine.] 1.

To stain or cover with blood; smear with gore.

Where cattle pastured late, now scatter'd lies
With carcasses and arms the ensanguined field, Deserted.

Milton, P. L., xi. 654.

He answered not, but with a sudden hand
Made bare his branded and ensanguined brow.

Shelley, Adonais, xxxiv.

2. To color like blood; impart a crimson color to.

In general color they were pink, . . . but the outer petals were dashed with a deep carmine, ensanguined, brilliant.

C. D. Warner, Roundabout Journey, p. 67.

ensate (en'sät), a. [< NL. ensatus, < L. ensis, a sword.] In bot. and zool., ensiform: as, the ensate ovipositors of certain Orthoptera.

enscale (en-skäl'), v. t.; pret. and pp. enscaled, ppr. enscaling. [< en-1 + scale¹.] To carve or form with scales. [Rare.]

enschedule (en-sked'ül), v. t.; pret. and pp. enscheduled, ppr. enscheduling. [< en-1 + schedule.] To schedule; insert in a schedule.

Our just demands;

Whose tenors and particular effects

You have, enschedul'd briefly, in your hands.

Shak., Hen. V., v. 2.

ensconce (en-skons'), v. t.; pret. and pp. ensconced, ppr. ensconcing. [Formerly also in-sconce, in-sconse; < en-1 + sconce.] 1. To cover or shelter as with a sconce or fort; protect; hide securely; give shelter or security to.

I with small Boates and 200, men would haue gone to the head of the riuier Chawonock, with sufficient guides by land, in-sconcing my selfe every two dayes.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, I. 88.

I will ensconce me behind the arras.

Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 3.

Convey him to the sanctuary of rebels, Nestorius' house, where our proud brother has Enscoc'd himself.

Shirley (and Fletcher?), Coronation, iv. 1.

Pedro de Vargas, a shrewd, hardy, and vigilant soldier, alcaide of Gibraltar, . . . lay ensconced in his old warrior rock as in a citadel.

Irving, Granada, p. 75.

Hence—2. To fix firmly or snugly; settle; lodge: as, he ensconced himself in his comfortable arm-chair. [Colloq.]

ensculpture (en-skulp'tür), v. t.; pret. and pp. ensculptured, ppr. ensculpturing. [< en-1 + sculpture.] To carve; sculpture. [Poetical.]

Those shapes distinct

That yet survive ensculptured on the walls

Of palaces or temples, 'mid the wreck

Of faded Persepolis.

Wordsworth, Apology.

enseal (en-säl'), v. t. [< ME. enselen, < OF. ensealer, ensealer, ensecler, enseller, etc., < ML. insigil- lare, enseal, < in, in, + sigillare, seal: see seal², v.] 1. To set one's seal to; ratify formally. [Archaic.]

ensemble (F. pron. on-som'bl), adv. [ME. ensemble, < OF. ensemble, F. ensemble = Pr. ensembs, ensembs = OCat. ensembs = OSP. ensemble = OPg. ensembra = It. insieme, insebre, insembra, together, < LL. insimul, at the same time, mixed with insemel, at once, < in + simul, together, akin to semel, once, both akin to E. same, q. v. Cf. assemble, resemble.] Together; all at once; simultaneously.

In time togethers we haue be ensemble,

Where-of of pete my hert doth trimble.

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), I. 3996.

ensemble (F. pron. on-som'bl), n. [F., < ensemble, together: see ensemble, adv.] 1. The union of parts in a whole; all the parts of anything taken together, so that each part is considered only in relation to the whole; specifically, the general effect of a work of art, piece of music, drama, etc.—2. In music, the union of all the performers in a concerted composition, as in a chorus with full orchestral accompaniment.—3. In math., a manifold or collection of elements, discrete or continuous, finite, infinite, or superinfinite. The elements of the ensemble are usually termed its points. The integrant parts of an ensemble are all the other ensembles whose elements are elements of it. Two ensembles whose elements are capable of being put into a one-to-one correspondence with one another are said to have the same value or to be equivalent. The first value is the smallest infinite value, or that of the ensemble of positive whole numbers. A linear ensemble is one whose elements can be brought into correspondence each with a different point of one line. A derived ensemble is one which consists of all the limits of elements in a primitive ensemble. An ensemble is said to be condensed within a certain interval if there are elements of the ensemble in every part of the interval, however small. Disconnected ensembles are ensembles which have no common element. A definite ensemble is an ensemble such that every object is either determined to be an element of it or determined not to be so, and no object is determined in both ways. An ordered ensemble is one in which the elements have a definite succession. A perfect ensemble is one which is its own derived succession. See number.—First genus of ensembles, that class of ensembles which have only a finite number of successive derived ensembles, since the elements of the *n*th derived ensemble have no limits.—Second genus of ensembles, that class of ensembles which have an infinite succession of derived ensembles.—Tout ensemble, the entire combination or collocation; the assemblage of parts or arrangement of details viewed as a whole: as, the tout ensemble of the piece is admirable.

enseite (en-sē'tē), n. [Abyssinian.] An Abyssinian name of Musa Ensete, a noble plant of the banana genus. It produces leaves about 20 feet long and 3 or 4 broad, the largest entire leaf as yet known. The flower-stalk, which is as thick as a man's arm, is used for food, but the fruit is worthless.

enshader, inshader (en-, in-shād'), v. t. [en-1, in-1, + shade.] To mark with different gradations of colors. Latham.

Lily-white inshaded with the rose.

enshield (en-shield'), v. t.; pret. and pp. enshielded (pp. abbr. enshielded in extract). [en-1 + shield.] To shield; cover; protect.

These black masks

Proclaim an enshield beauty, ten times louder

Than beauty could. Shak., M. for M., ii. 4.

enshore (en-shōr'), v. t. [en-1 + shore.] To enharbor. Davies.

Then Death (the end of ill unto the good)

Enshore my soule neer drown'd in flesh and blood.

Davies, Wittes Pilgrimage, p. 40.

enshrine (en-shrin'), v. t.; pret. and pp. enshrined, ppr. enshrining. [Formerly also inshrine; < en-1 + shrine.] To inclose in or as in a shrine or chest; deposit for safe-keeping in or as in a cabinet; hence, to preserve with care and affection; cherish.

In his own verse the poet still we find,

In his own page his memory lives enshrined.

O. W. Holmes, Bryant's Seventieth Birthday.

The whole of the dagoba, which is 8 ft. in diameter, has been hollowed out to make a cell, in which an image of Buddha is enshrined.

J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 132.

enshroud (en-shroud'), v. t. [Formerly also inshroud; < en-1 + shroud.] To cover with or as with a shroud; hence, to envelop with anything which conceals from observation: as, the sun was enshrouded in mist; to enshroud one's purpose in mystery.

They lurk enshrouded in the vale of night.

Churchill, The Apology.

ensiferous (en-sif'e-rus), a. [L. ensifer (< ensis, a sword, + -fer, < ferre = E. bear) + -ous.] Bearing or carrying a sword. Coles, 1717; Bailey, 1733.

See cartilage.

ensign (en'sin), n. [Formerly ensigne (and corruptly ancient, ancient, in the sense of standard-bearer: see ancient), < OF. ensigne, enseigne, F. enseigne = Pr. enseigna, enseyna, essenha = OSp. enseña = Sp. Pg. insignia = It. insegna, < ML. insignia, L. insigne, a standard, badge, mark (pl. insignia), neut. of insignis, distinguished by a mark, remarkable: see insignia. Cf. ensign, v.] 1. The flag or banner distinguishing a company of soldiers, an army, or a vessel; colors; a standard.

Hang up your ensigns, let your drums be still.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 4.

Those arms, those ensigns, borne away,

Accomplished Rokeby's brave array,

But all were lost on Marston's day.

Scott, Rokeby, v. 4.

We heard

The drowsy folds of our great ensign shake

From blazon'd lions o'er the imperial tent

Whispers of war. Tennyson, Princess, v.

I saw no sailors, but a great Spanish ensign floated over, and waved, a funeral plume.

G. W. Curtis, True and I, p. 90.

Specifically—2. In Great Britain, a flag composed of a field of white, blue, or red, with the union in the upper corner, next the staff. Formerly flags with fields of all the three colors were used in the naval service, but now the white only is used for men-of-war, the red flag being assigned to the merchant service and the blue to the Royal Naval Reserve. In the United States navy the ensign is the national flag. See flag and union.

3†. A sign or signal.

At the rebuke of five shall ye flee: till ye be left . . . as an ensign on an hill. Isa. xxx. 17.

4. A badge; a mark of distinction, rank, or office; a symbol; in the plural, insignia.

The Olive was wont to be the ensigne of Peace and quietness. Spenser, Shep. Cal., April, Glosses.

His arms, or ensigns of power, are a pipe in his left hand, composed of seven reeds. Bacon, Fable of Pan.

Cupids . . . all armed with bows, quivers, wings, and other ensigns of love. B. Jonson, Masque of Beauty.

The tax on the armorial bearings or ensigns blazoned on the carriage. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, III. 178.

5†. Name and rank used as a battle-cry or watchword.

When the Duke saugh hem come, he cride his ensigne, and lete renne to them; that he sye comynge, and smote in amonge hem fiercely. Merlyn (E. E. T. S.), II. 161.

6. In the British army, until 1871, one of the lowest grade of commissioned officers in a regiment of infantry, the senior of whom carried the ensign or colors of the regiment: now called second lieutenant. (See lieutenant.) The rank of ensign also existed in the American revolutionary army.

It was on occasion of one of these suppers that Sir James Mackintosh happened to bring with him a raw Scotch cousin, an ensign in a Highland regiment.

Lady Holland, in Sydney Smith, iv.

7. In the United States navy, one of the lowest grade of commissioned officers, ranking with second lieutenant in the army. The title was first introduced in 1862, taking the place of passed midshipman.—8†. A company of troops led by an ensign.

Which also was defended a while with certain ensigns of footmen and certain pieces of artillery.

Expedition in Scotland (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 117).

ensign (en-sin' or en'sin), v. t. [ME. ensigen, ensigenen, < OF. ensigner, enseigner, mark, point out, tell, inform, indicate, F. enseigner, tell, inform, teach, instruct, = Pr. enseigner, ensegnar, essegnar = Sp. enseñar = Pg. ensinar = It. insegnare, < ML. insignare, mark, indicate; cf. L. insigne, put a mark upon, distinguish, insignis, distinguished by a mark, < in, on, + signum, sign: see sign, and cf. ensign, n., on which the E. verb in part depends.] 1†. To mark or distinguish by some sign; form the badge of.

Henry but joined the roses, that ensigned

Particular families, but this hath joined

The Rose and Thisle.

B. Jonson, Prince Henry's Barriers.

2. In her., to distinguish (a charge) by a mark or an ornament, as a crown, coronet, or miter, borne on or over it: as, the heart in the arms of Douglas is ensigned with a royal crown (see the cut)—that is, with a crown borne on the top of it. A staff is sometimes said to be ensigned with a flag.—3†. To point out to; signify to.

When the queene had called them and demaunded theym the place where our lord Ihesu cryst had be crucified, they would neuer telle ne ensigne hyr.

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 157.

ensign-bearer (en'sin-bār'ēr), n. One who carries the flag; an ensign.

If it be true that the giants ever made war against heaven, he had been a fit ensign-bearer for that company.

Sir P. Sidney.

ensigncy (en'sin-si), n. [en-1 + sign + -cy.] Same as ensignship.

It is, perhaps, one of the curious anomalies which pervade many parts of our system, that an ensigncy should exist in the engineer department, there being no colours to be carried in that corps.

Rees, Cyc.

ensignship (en'sin-ship), n. [en-1 + sign + -ship.] The rank, office, or commission of an ensign.

ensilage (en'si-lāj), n. [F. ensilage: see ensile.] 1. A mode of storing fodder, vegetables, etc., in a green state, by burying it or them in pits or silos dug in the ground. See silo. This method has been practised in some countries from very early times, and has been recommended by modern agriculturists. Brick-lined chambers are often used in modern practice, having a movable wooden covering upon which is placed a heavy weight, say half a ton to the square yard. The pits or chambers are constructed in such a way as to exclude the air as far as possible.

It is not the least of the recommendations of the new process of preserving green fodder, called ensilage, that the exclusion of oxygen is an essential feature in it, fire-risks being thus avoided.

W. L. Carpenter, Energy in Nature (1st ed.), p. 79.

One of the earliest of Latin writers refers to subterranean vaults (silos), wherein the ancient Romans preserved green forage, grain, and fruit, and the Mexicans have practised the system for centuries. This, at any rate, is vouched for by Mr. John M. Bailey, one of the pioneers of the system in the United States, whose "Book of Ensilage," etc.

Mark Lane Express.

2. The fodder, etc., thus preserved.

This is probably the kind of fermentation by which grass is converted into ensilage. Amer. Chem. Jour., VIII. 336.

ensilage (en'si-lāj), v. t.; pret. and pp. ensilaged, ppr. ensilaging. [en-1 + silage, n.] To store by ensilage; store in a pit or silo for preservation. See silo.

The advantage of an ensilaged crop is that it makes the farmer independent of drought.

West Chester (Pa.) Republican, VI. 4.

ensile (en'sil), v. t.; pret. and pp. ensiled, ppr. ensiling. [Sp. ensilar, preserve grain in a place under ground, < en, in, + silo, < L. sirus, < Gr. σῖρος, also σείρος, a pit to keep grain in: see silo.] To preserve in or as if in a silo; prepare as ensilage.

Ensiling has been accomplished without any chamber at all, the green fodder being simply stacked in the open and heavily pressed, the outer parts being, however, exposed to the air. H. Robinson, Sewage Question, p. 222.

ensiludium (en-si-lū'di-um), n.; pl. ensiludia (-ia). [ML., < L. ensis, a sword, + ludere, play.] In the middle ages, a friendly contest with swords, usually with bated or blunted weapons. Compare hastilude.

ensilver, v. t. [ME. ensilveren; < en-1 + silver.] To cover or adorn with silver. Wyclif, Bar. vi. 7 (Oxf.).

ensindon, v. t. [en-1 + sindon.] To wrap in a sindon or linen cloth. Davies.

Now doth this loving sacred Synaxie

(With diuine orizons and deuout teares)

Ensindon Him with choicest draperie.

Davies, Holy Rood, p. 28.

Ensis (en'sis), n. [NL., < L. ensis, a sword.] A genus of razor-clams, of the family Solenidae, Razor-clam (Ensis americanus).

including those species in which the hinge-teeth are several and the shell is curved. Ensis americanus is the common razor-fish or razor-clam of American waters. The genus was formerly included in Solen.

ensiset, n. [Erroneous form of ME. assise, E. assize, abbr. sizel.] Assize; quality; stamp; character.

ensisternal (en-si-stēr'nal), a. [L. ensis, a sword, + Gr. στέρνον, the breast-bone (see sternum), + -al.] In anat., of or pertaining to the ensiform appendage or xiphoid cartilage; xiphisternal. Bécclard.

ensky (en-ski'), v. t.; pret. and pp. enskied, ppr. enskying. [en-1 + sky.] To place in heaven or among the gods; make immortal. [Poetical.]

I hold you as a thing ensky'd and sainted.

Shak., M. for M., l. 5.

enslandert, v. t. [ME. enslaudren, < en-1 + slaudren, slander: see en-1 and slander.] To slander; bring reproach upon.

gif ther be in bretherhede eny riotour, other contekour, other such by whom the fraternite myght be enslandred, he shal be put out therof. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 4.

enslave (en-slāv'), v. t.; pret. and pp. enslaved, ppr. enslaving. [en-1 + slave.] 1. To make a slave of; reduce to slavery or bondage; subject to the arbitrary will of a master: as, barbarous nations enslave their prisoners of war.

What do these worthies,

But rob, and spoil, burn, slaughter, and enslave

Peaceable nations? Milton, P. R., III. 75.

It was also held lawful to enslave any infidel or person who did not receive the Christian faith.

Sumner, Orations, I. 217.

2. Figuratively, to reduce to a condition analogous to slavery; deprive of moral liberty or power; subject to an enthralling influence: as, to be enslaved by drink or one's passions.

Enslav'd am I, though King, by one wild Word,

And my own Promise is my cruel Lord.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, III. 192.

Having first brought into subjection the bodies of men, had no hard task, afterwards, to enslave their souls.

Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. III.

Women of genius, even more than men, are likely to be enslaved by an impassioned sensibility.

Mary, Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 108.

enslavedness (en-slā'vəd-nes), n. The state of being enslaved.

enslavement (en-slā'və-mənt), n. [< enslave + -ment.] The act of enslaving, or the state of being enslaved, literally or figuratively; slavery; bondage; servitude.

Abolition by sovereign will of a slave State now ceased, and as for enslavement by a free State's legislation, this had never been attempted. Schouler, Hist. U. S., III. 136.

The effect of his [the negro's] enslavement, then, was not to civilize him in any sense, but merely to change him from a wild animal into a domesticated or tame one. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVI. 233.

enslaver (en-slā'vər), n. One who or that which enslaves or reduces to bondage, either literal or figurative.

What indignation in her mind Against enslavers of mankind! Swift.

enslumber, v. t. [ME. enslombren; < en-1 + slumber.] To dull; enervate.

Son, lett not ydelness gou enslombre,
Nor wyddnesse of clothys gou encombre.
MS. Ashmole, 62, fol. 65. (Halliwell.)

ensnare, ensnarer. See insnare, insnarer.

ensnarl¹ (en-snarl'), v. t. [< en-1 + snarl¹.]

To snarl, as a dog; growl. Cockeram.

ensnarl² (en-snarl'), v. t. [< en-1 + snarl².]

To entangle as in a snarl; insnare.

With noyse whereof when as the caytive carle
Shoud issue forth, in hope to find some spoyle,
They in awayt would closely him ensnarle.
Spenser, F. Q., V. ix. 9.

ensober (en-sō'bər), v. t. [< en-1 + sober.]

To make sober.

God sent him sharpnesses and sad accidents to ensober his spirits. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 834.

ensorcelt, v. t. [< OF. ensorceltor, bewitch; < en- + sorcelt, bewitch; see sorcery.] To bewitch; use sorcery upon.

Not any one of all these honor'd parts
Your princely happes and habites that do moue,
And as it were ensorcelt all the hearts
Of Christen kings to quarrel for your loue.
Wyatt, quoted in Puttenham's Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 187.

ensoul (en-sōl'), v. t. [< en-1 + soul.] To endow or imbue with a soul.

Maugre my endeour
My Numbers still by habite haue the Feuer;
One-while with heat of heavenly fire ensoul'd;
Shivering anon, through faint vn-learned cold.
Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, The Furies.

Passion beholds its object as a perfect unit. The soul is wholly embodied, and the body is wholly ensouled.

Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 167.

In such language (surcharged and flooded with life), not only are thoughts embodied, but words are ensouled.

Whipple, Lit. and Life, p. 226.

enspangle (en-spang'l), v. t. [< en-1 + spangle.]

To cover with spangles; spangle. Davies.

One more by thee, love and desert have sent T' enspangle this expansive firmament.

Herrick, Hesperides, p. 204.

ensphere, insphere (en-, in-sfēr'), v. t.; pret. and pp. ensphered, insphered, ppr. ensphering, insphering. [< en-1, in-2, + sphere.] 1. To place in or as in a sphere.

His ample shoulders in a cloud ensphered
Of fierce chrimine.
Chapman, tr. of Homeric Hymn to Hermes.

Now it seemed as if we ourselves, sitting there ensphered in color, flew around the globe with the quivering rays.
E. S. Phelps, Beyond the Gates, p. 164.

2. To make into a sphere.

One shall ensphere thine eyes; another shall Impearl thy teeth.
Carew, Obsequies to the Lady Ann Hay.

enstall, v. t. An obsolete form of install. Holland; Stirling.

enstamp (en-stamp'), v. t. [Also instamp; < en-1 + stamp.] To impress with or as with a stamp; impress deeply; stamp.

Nature hath enstamped upon the soul of man the certainty of a Delty. Heuvel, Sermons (1658), p. 194.

enstatite, v. t. An obsolete variant of instatite. enstatite (en-stā'tīt), n. [< Gr. ἐνστάτης, an adversary (cf. ἐνστάτης, opposing, checking, starting difficulties) (< ἐνστάθαι, stand against, < ἐν, in, on, + ἵσθαι, mid. ἵσθαί, stand), + -ίτης.] A silicate, chiefly of magnesium, with some iron, belonging to the pyroxene group. It varies in color from white to green, and crystallizes in the orthorhombic system. It is infusible before the blowpipe, whence the name. It is a common mineral in certain rocks, especially in peridotites and the serpentines derived from them; also in many meteoric stones. Bronzite is a ferrous enstatite. Chladinite, from the Bishopville (South Carolina) meteorite, is nearly pure magnesium enstatite.

enstatite-dibase (en-stā'tīt-dī'-ā-bās), n. Same as palatinite.

enstile, v. t. See enstyle.

enstock (en-stok'), v. t. [< en-1 + stock.] To fix as in the stocks.

Not that (as Stoicks) I intend to tie
With Iron Chains of stroug Necessity
Th' Eternal's hands, and his free feet enstock
In Destinies hard Diamantine Rock.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 4.

enstore (en-stōr'), v. t. [ME. enstoren, instore (accm. to restore, > E. restore, q. v.), < L. instaurare, renew, restore; see instaurate.] To restore; renew; repeat; recapitulate.

And if ther be any other maundement, it is instorid in this word, thou schalt loue thi neighbors as thi self.

Wyclif, Rom. xiii. 9.

enstrangle, v. t. [ME. enstranglen; < en-1 + strangle.] To strangle.

Thei scholde suffren to gret payne, zif thei abyden to dyen be hem self, as Nature wolde: and whan thei ben thus enstrangled, thei eten here Flesche, in stede of Venysoun.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 194.

enstuff, v. t. [< en-1 + stuff.] To stuff; stow; cram.

Hast thou not read how wise Ulysses did Enstuffe his eares with waxe?

Wyatt, To his Friend T.

In the dark bulk they close bodies of men
Chosen by lot, and did enstuff by stealth
The hollow womb with armed soldiers.

Surrey, Aeneid, II.

enstyle (en-stīl'), v. t. [Also enstille; < en-1 + style.] To style; name; call.

A man,
Built with God's finger, and enstiled his Temple.

(From Archæol. Inst. Report on Assos Expedition.)

which rests upon the columns and extends upward to the roof, or to the tympana of the pediments if these features are present. In the classical styles it consists of three members, the architrave, the frieze, and the cornice. In large buildings projecting features, similar in form to entablatures proper, and also called by this name, are often carried around the whole edifice, or along the front only; and the term is applied by engineers to similar parts of the framing of machinery wherein architectural design is introduced. See also cut under column.

2. In law, to limit and restrict the descent of (lands and tenements) by gift to a man and to a specified line of heirs, by settlement in such wise that neither the donee nor any subsequent possessor can alienate or bequeath it: as, to entail a manor to A. B. and to his eldest son, or to his heirs of his body begotten, or to his heirs by a particular wife. See entail, n., 3.

He (Moses) doth not (Now) study to make his Will,
T' entail his Land to his Male-Issue still:
Wisely and lustily to divide his Good,
To Sons and Daughters, and his nearest Blood.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., The Lawe.

I here entail
The crown to thee, and to thine heirs for ever.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., l. 1.

Hence—3. To fix inalienably on a person or thing, or on a person and his descendants; transmit in an unalterable course; devolve as an unavoidable consequence.

My grief's entailed upon my wasterful breath,
Which no recovery can cut off but death.
Quarles, Emblems, iii. 15.

The intemperate and unjust transmit their bodily infirmities and diseases to their children, and entail a secret curse upon their estates.

It is entailed upon humanity to submit.
Goldsmith, Vicar, xix.

A vicious form of legal procedure, for example, either enacted or tolerated, entails on suitors costs, or delays, or defeats.

H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 50.

4. To bring about; cause to ensue or accrue; induce; involve or draw after itself.

Political economy tells us that loss is entailed by a forced trade with colonies.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 501.

No member of the chamber can, without its assent, be submitted to examination or arrest for any proceeding entailing penalties, unless seized in the act or within 24 hours of the same.

Browning, King and Book, I. 183.

entail (en-tail'), n. [Formerly also entail; < ME. entaille, entayle, < OF. entaille, F. entaille (ML. intalia), f., = Pr. entail = OSp. entalle = Pg. entallho = It. intaglio (> E. intaglio, q. v.), m., a cutting, cut, notch, groove; from the verb.] 1. Engraved or carved work; intaglio; inlay.

A worke of rich entayle and curious mould,
Woven with antickes and wyld ynagery.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 4.

2. Shape; that which is carved or shaped.

An image of another entaille
A liffte halfe was her fayn by,
Her name alsoe her heed saw I,
And she was called Felony.

Rom. of the Rose, l. 162.

3. In law: (a) The limitation of land to certain members of a particular family or line of descent; a prescribed order of successive inheritances, voluntarily created, to keep land in the family undivided; the rule of descent settled for an estate.

He (Walpole) scoffed at . . . the practice of entail, and tasked the ingenuity of conveyancers to tie up his villa in the strictest settlement.

Macaulay, Horace Walpole.

(b) An estate entailed or limited to particular heirs; an estate given to a man and his heirs. The word is now, however, often loosely used, since strict entails are obsolete, to indicate the giving of property to one or to two successively for life with suspension of power of alienation meanwhile. By early English law, as fully established under the Norman conquest, a feoffment or grant of land to "A and the heirs of his body" created an entail, so that neither A nor any successive heir taking under the grant could alien the land; and if the line of heirs failed, the land reverted to the lord who made the grant, or his heirs. In course of time the inconveniences of the restriction on alienation led the courts to hold that such a gift must be understood not as a gift to the heirs after A, but to A on condition that he should have heirs; in other words, that the heirs could not claim as donees under the feoffment, but only as heirs under A, and that hence A took a fee, which, if he had heirs of his body, became absolute, and enabled him to alien the land. This practical abolition of entails by the courts was followed by the statute of Westminster of 1285, known as the statute de Donis Conditionalibus, which enacted that the will of the donor in such gifts according to the form manifestly expressed should be observed, so that such a grantee should have no power to alien. Under this act, which re-established entails, a large part of the land in England was fettered by such grants. The courts, still disfavoring entails, termed the estate thus granted a fee tail (see tail), and sustained alienations by the tenant in tail, subject, however, to the right of the heirs in tail, or, if none, of the lord, to enter on the death of the tenant who had conveyed. (See base fee, under fee.) They subsequently also sanctioned absolute alienations by allowing the tenant in tail to have an action brought against him in which he collusively suffered the plaintiff to recover the land. (See fine, recovery, and Taltarum's case, under case.) In 1833 a direct deed was substituted by statute for this fiction. The object of entails is now, to some extent, secured by family or marriage settlements, which are often, but inaccurately, spoken of as if effecting entails. In most if not all of the United States, and in Canada, entails have been abolished, either as in England or by statutes declaring that words which would formerly create an entail create a fee simple, or, as in some States, a life estate with remainder in fee simple to heirs.—Quasi entail, an entail of an estate less than a fee, such as an estate for the life of a third person.—Statute of entail, a name sometimes given to the statute de Donis Conditionalibus (which see, above).—To bar an entail, to dock an entail, to defeat the restrictions of an entail by aliening or resettling the land.

entailer (en-tā'ler), n. One who executes an entail; one who limits the descent of his property to a particular heir or series of heirs.

The entailer cannot disappoint those children who have rights to a portion of his property.

entasia (en-tā'si-ä), n. [NL.: see entasis.] Same as entasis, 2.

entasis (en'tā-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. ἐντασις, a stretching, distention, < ἐντείνω (= L. intendere), stretch, < ἐν, in, on, + τείνω (= L. tendere, stretch: see tend).] 1. In arch., the swelling or outward curve of the profile of the shaft of a column. The entasis exists in perfection in the finest examples of Greek Doric, in which the swelling is greatest a little below the middle point of the shaft, but never so great as to interfere with the steady diminution of the shaft from the base upward. The entasis is designed both to counteract the optical illusion which would cause the profiles of the shafts to appear curved inward if they were bounded by straight lines, and to give the
